The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I understand these propositions are tied together. We have got to vote for consideration of all of them or against consideration of all of them.

The SPEAKER. The motion is in that form.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. These three propositions to be considered under the proposed order are the pure-food bill, the bill restricting immigration, and the penal code.

The SPEAKER. That is true unless the motion is modified, and it can only be divided by unanimous consent.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. So that we are put in a position we must either vote for consideration of all of them or against consideration of all of them?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will see that; the motion speaks for itself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Have we not the right to call for a division of the vote?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi will notice that this is a motion to suspend all rules and pass the order—that is, without regard to rules. The request for a division is given under the rules; but this is a motion to suspend that rule as well as all others.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Until the motion to suspend all the rules is passed we are still working under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The motion is that the rules be suspended. The rule says that on certain Mondays it shall be in order to move to suspend the rules and pass the proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Right there, Mr. Speaker, is the point whether or not even upon a motion to suspend the rules there is not the right to consider independent propositions contained in one order, separating one from the other?

The SPEAKER. And call for a division on the question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. No; not under a uniform ruling of the Chair for a generation.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to consume the time of the House except to put before the House, if it has not already understood it, what the proposition is. The proposition, as I understand it, is to pass this resolution, which gives certain bills named in the resolution the same privileges that bills coming from committees having the right to report and call up the bills they report at any time. Amongst these bills the first one proposed is what is known as the "pure-food bill," or rather the bill which by title and purport and intent is solely to provide against the misbranding of food products, drugs, etc.—the adulteration of foods, etc. The other bill, as I understand it, is the one which restricts immigration, and the third part of the order provides for the House having sessions in the evening to consider what is known as the bill for revision of the criminal laws of the United States for the purpose of codifying them. Taking up these laws in the inverse order in which they are stated in the rule, I apprehend that no lawyer upon the floor of this House, no man who has had occasion to practice in the United States courts, will doubt that the third proposition is of the utmost importance—a work that has been done, and I understand well done, by the Commission appointed by the President to revise and codify the criminal statutes. I have read the report which comes from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, made by its able chairman, and I desire to say that it is a most painstaking, able, and elaborate report, and I believe that consideration ought to be given to that bill, that the country might know what the criminal statutes of the United States are that are in existence, and that the profession and the people may have ready access to a statute where they may be readily found. As for the immigration bill, I am in favor of many of the provisions of the bill reported, and believe that the Congress of the United States ought to enact law which would further restrict immigration to this country.

As for the other bill, known as the "pure-food bill," I do not deem it to be worthy of the consideration of the House as these other bills are. The bill proposes from its very title to the very last line written in it that the Congress of the United States shall enact purely police laws to govern the trade in certain foods and drugs. The phrase "interstate commerce" nowhere occurs in the title, so the bill itself is nothing more than a bill to enact police laws of the United States for the States of the Union—a thing which in my judgment Congress ought not and can not do. What the purpose of joining these two meritorious measures with the one which in my judgment is not meritorious, one that should not receive the sanction and approval of this House is, I do not know. This I do know: I am not in favor of, and I trust that this side of the House at least will not permit the joining of these two meritorious measures of which most of us are in favor, and I hope that the House will not permit this rule to be passed dragging along with these meritorious measures as it does the other bill which I do not believe we ought to consider or vote for—I mean the pure-food bill, at least not without ample debate. This bill known as the "pure-food bill," inaugurates here in Washington a bureau, another bureau in the Agricultural Department, for the purpose of enabling the Bureau of Chemistry of the Agricultural Department to declare what is adulterated and what is not adulterated food, and to establish standards of foods for all the States. It strikes down with one fell blow all the laws of the States of the Union that have been enacted in behalf and in the interest of pure food and the enforcement of pure-food laws. I do not care to further detain the House, Mr. Speaker. I apprehend all of those Members who have given the matter attention are fully aware of the provisions of the alleged pure-food bill. I desire to state this fact, that the committee from which this bill comes has not yet completed consideration of some amendments that have been suggested. There are some amendments that are very serious and of great importance that are still pending before that committee with a view of reporting them to the House and having them made a part of the bill as committee amendments. We expected to have further consideration in order that the bill, if it shall pass, may be perfected in many particulars.

Mr. Speaker, how much more time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, as I stated in my parliamentary inquiry a few moments ago, as I understand this situation, these three measures are tied together. I agree in part with my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. I do not see how any lawyer can possibly object to the consideration of the national penal code from the Committee on Revision of the Laws. I am not, of course, familiar with that legislation, but see no objection to its consideration. I agree with my friend from Georgia in that I am heartily in favor of the bill to restrict undesirable immigration. From the reports of the Commissioner of Immigration and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and my research (my views being contained in the speech I have already made in this House upon the subject of further restrictions upon immigration) I believe that is a measure important to the interests of the American people at this time. As to the pure-food bill, I have not given it the investigation which I hope and expect to give it, but I wish to have the immigration bill considered, and it ought to be given consideration. I do not wish to lose this opportunity of getting that measure before the House.

Now, every Member of the House by this proposed order is placed in the position that he has got to vote to give or not to give precedence upon the Calendar—or, rather, to give or not to give the same right to these measures as is given to appropriation bills—and he has got to vote to give all of them that right or he has got to vote to give none of them that right, and I want the House to understand that. So far as I am concerned, being in favor as I am of the bill to restrict immigration, I do not see how I can vote otherwise than for this order, unless these propositions are separated, and I would much prefer to see them separated. But the Speaker informed me, upon my parliamentary inquiry, that the House would have to vote for consideration of all of the propositions or against consideration of all of the propositions, according to the proposed order, unless unanimous consent is given to vote upon them separately, and this can not be obtained, it is apparent.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has half of one minute.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield that to Mr. HENRY of Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not desire the time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Is there not any way of dividing this proposition?

The SPEAKER. The motion speaks for itself; it can not be divided except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama to yield to me.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly; I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I wish to ask the distinguished gentleman from Iowa if we can not have unanimous consent to divide the question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the effect of this proposition, so far as the pure-food bill is concerned, is to restore it to the position of privilege it lost a few days since. I desire to call the attention of the House to the remarks made by the gentlemen from Georgia [Messrs. BARTLETT and ADAMSON] in criticism made upon the pure-food bill. This House, Mr. Speaker, has become accustomed during the Fifty-seventh, Fifty-eighth, and Fifty-ninth Congresses to just such criticisms as those gentlemen have passed upon the pure-food bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman from Alabama, who has lost his bearing on this question, yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask that he have order and a respectful hearing.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I say, Mr. Chairman, that these worthy and distinguished gentlemen simply repeat the misapplied theories of States rights to the pure-food bill. There is an express reservation found in section 12 of the bill that it shall not be construed to interfere with commerce wholly internal in any State nor with the exercise of their police powers by the several States, etc.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; I can not yield to my friend at this moment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Just for——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I have but five minutes allowed me and I regret that I can not yield further to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. ADAMSON. Just a minute.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The pure-food bill has been before the House certainly through the Fifty-seventh, Fifty-eighth, and Fifty-ninth Congresses, and at last the Senate, that has heretofore taken but little, if any, notice of any bills that have been passed by the House, have passed a bill, and it has come to the House, and we have perfected—if I may be allowed to say—that into one of the best bills probably that we have ever had before the House from the Interstate Commerce Committee, notwithstanding the objection made by the two distinguished Georgians. A pure-food bill passed the House in the Fifty-seventh and Fifty-eighth Congresses, and, with a part of the minority of the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee, I have been an earnest advocate of the passage by Congress of this legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The question I wanted to ask the gentleman from Alabama was this: Even supposing his position is perfectly correct in regard to the pure-food bill—assuming that now for the sake of argument—does he think that that would justify coupling three or four bills together in one order, so as to logroll the support of each in support of all? Does he think that this parliamentary device is one which can be indorsed by any of us?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do not agree to that. I do not think they ought to be coupled together. I am in favor of giving the right of way to the pure-food bill and the immigration bill, but I do not desire to couple with them the bill for the revision of laws.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well, then. I hope to have the gen- understands that we are placed by this order in the parliamentary attitude that if we vote against one of these bills we are bound to vote against the consideration of all.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I would like to see them considered separately, if the gentleman desires to know my view in regard to it. If I had my way, I would strike out the bill for the revision of laws and give the other two bills the privilege of being called up.

Mr. Speaker, we were talking about the pure-food bill and its merits, as I understand it. I desire the House to understand that we had uncontradicted and reliable testimony before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on this one article that there were 60,000,000 gallons of whisky made in the State of Kentucky annually, and that only 15,000,000 of it was pure. The rest is altogether adulterated. This is but a sample of the adulteration of various other food products. Yet gentlemen will say there ought to be no legislation on so important a subject as that of the purity of our food. This bill does not interfere with the honest dealer or manufacturer. And yet the fact remains, Mr. Speaker, that in many of the States where they have undertaken by statutes to regulate the adulteration of food it has totally and absolutely failed to accomplish the desired end. Why has it been a failure? It is simply because, as was so well described before the Interstate Commerce Committee, as was done by a gentleman from Michigan, that he had to prepare different brands or labels for different States where he sold his goods having practically the same statutes, because different State commissioners of food had given different constructions to really the same statute, and this gentleman had to make his cans and his preparations comply with the different constructions made by different State commissioners. What the commerce of the country desires is uniformity in our food standards. This can only be accomplished by Federal legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask three minutes longer from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is utterly impossible to enforce the different statutes of the different States on account of the difference of standards in the different States; hence arises the absolute necessity of legislation by Congress for the government of this matter. There are too many different constructions given in the different States to make it practicable to give the public the protection against fraud, deception, and misrepresentation so generally resorted to throughout the country in the matter of the sale of our food products. This bill that we have does not legalize in any improper or dangerous way the sale of opium or morphine or any of that nature of poisonous and destructive medicines, as has been charged. It merely provides, in that important feature, that the quantity or proportion of opium or morphine need not be stated on the label unless the proportion contained in an article is more than the Pharmacopœia provides; but wherever cocaine is used at all, it is required to be put upon the label. We know that soothing sirups and a great many innocent medicines of that kind that enter into daily domestic use have a certain amount of morphine or opium in them. Would anyone be so unreasonable as to require that to be labeled when it complies with the Pharmacopœia, as prescribed by the medical fraternity and by the pharmacists, who professionally prescribe these quantities? It would be a vexatious and unnecessary requirement in opposition to the aim and end of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think I am within the rule when I ask the gentleman to yield to me one minute.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I will yield.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to ask the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, whom I love and honor as much as any Member of this House, if he can not discriminate between the rights of States and the duties of States?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Oh, yes. I have been taught, Mr. Speaker, just as thoroughly as my friend from Georgia, what are the rights of States; and I have been taught at the same time that the Federal Government, in the exercise of its lawful and constitutional functions, has some rights also. I have already referred to the section of this bill that provides that this bill shall not be construed as interfering with any of the police rights of the States. I look at this matter in entirely a different light from my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON]. Constitutionally no law can be passed by Congress that usurps the positive and reserved rights of the States, but Congress can pass a law tending to aid and help the States that desire protection from unwholesome, unhealthy, adulterated foods by bringing about uniformity of rules and standards by which the public can be more efficiently protected. Mr. Speaker, I have taken occasion to say on this floor before that I am just as much imbued with the sanctity of rights of the States as anyone on this floor. I do not concede to anyone a greater love and respect than I possess for the rights of the State. I believe in and uphold the exercise of the fullest rights of the State. I believe in the power of the State as to the enactment of its criminal laws and the punishment of its criminals. I believe in the power of the State to protect its people and the lives of its people in the matter of health. I believe in the right of the State to preserve order. All of these questions, it seems to me, are easily understood and applied and can be exercised without conflict with the Federal Government. If the State is unable by reason of impracticable conditions to make efficient its own laws, then the Congress of the United States has the constitutional right to so legislate as to help the State. This bill, if it becomes a law, will not hinder or prevent any State from enacting and enforcing the most drastic laws for the regulation of the sale of adulterated food products. Why, then, should our States rights friends complain?

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of correcting a misapprehension as to the length of the bill embracing the penal code of the United States. The impression seems to exist here that this bill includes an entire revision of the laws. I want to state that it is a short bill, embracing less than 400 sections, and that it is a bill which can be read in the short space of two or three evenings. What length of time it would take to discuss it, of course I can not undertake to say; but it is a bill in itself that will not take a very protracted time of the session of Congress for the purpose of reading.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LITTLEFIELD). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, when that bill is brought in here as part of the statute law that is now law, will it be susceptible to debate and amendment? If so, will it not take from now until the 4th of March to get through with it?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I understood the gentleman to say it would take from now to the 4th of March to read it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It would if the whole thing is run through.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I am only speaking of the time required for the reading of this bill, which embraces about 258 pages in all. It embraces simply the penal laws of the United States.

Mr. BARTLETT. As they have been collated.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Yes. Respecting the other question, I would not assume now to say. But my impression is they would be subject to amendment and discussion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, if that is the case, then the opinion of everyone in the House is liable to be expressed as to whether the law that is now the law should still remain the law or be modified in any respect.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. That may possibly be true.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And there is certainly enough in the criminal code for debate to last twelve months.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I would like a moment or two more.

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield a few moments.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I want to say that as far as the report of the committee itself is concerned, they have recommended but few changes in existing law; they refer to only a very few sections. The length of time required for the discussion of the bill I do not attempt to predict. I rise only for the purpose of correcting the impression that the reading of the bill would require a great deal of time. It is not in itself a very long bill. I repeat—less than 400 sections.

Mr. HEPBURN. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen do not understand the proposition before the House. It is simply for the purpose of restoring——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to ask you a question.

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield for a question.

Mr. ADAMSON. I know you can answer it. Do you not think that individualism and local responsibility are the guaranty of the safety of the Republic? [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I will answer that on some other occasion. I want to say at this time that the purpose of this order is this: It will be remembered that not many days ago the bill (S. 88) providing for the prevention of adulteration or misbranding of foods or drugs was made a special order. It was not called up at the time named in the order, because on that day an appropriation bill was before the House, and it is believed by many that therefore it lost its privileged character. The purpose of this order is to restore that privilege, in order that the bill, later on, when appropriation bills are not in the way, may be called up and considered. The order further provides——

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman understands that when the special order was made it provided that a certain time would be given for debate. This rule does not provide anything of the kind.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is true.

Mr. BARTLETT. It was the understanding when the special order was unanimously agreed to that at least a certain time for debate should be had upon the bill. This bill does not follow that in any way.

Mr. HEPBURN. I say that it does not, although I have no doubt but that every effort will be made by the friends of the bill to secure full time for its consideration.

Mr. Speaker, this order covers another bill to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, and a little further, one to provide for considering a bill providing a code of penal laws for the United States. The latter is conditional. That bill is to be considered at evening sessions—such evening sessions as the House at some future time may provide for. If it does not provide for them, then nothing will come from this provision in this order.

I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, to save the time of the House we had better have the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were 36 ayes.

Mr. ADAMSON. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

The negative vote being taken, there were 124 noes.

Accordingly (more than one-fifth voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 189, nays 43, answered "present" 19, not voting 130, as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

SUPPORT OF SCHOOLS, AND SO FORTH, IN ALASKA.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 3522) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the consideration and maintenance of roads, the establishment and maintenance of schools, and the care and support of insane persons in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved January 27, 1905.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction and maintenance of roads, the establishment and maintenance of schools, and the care and support of insane persons in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved January 27, 1905, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That all moneys derived from and collected for liquor licenses, occupation or trade licenses outside of the incorporated towns in the district of Alaska shall be deposited in the Treasury Department of the United States, there to remain as a separate and distinct fund, to be known as the 'Alaska fund,' and to be wholly devoted to the purposes hereinafter stated in the district of Alaska. One-fourth of said fund, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be devoted to the establishment and maintenance of public schools in said district; 5 per cent of said fund shall be devoted to the care and maintenance of insane persons in said district, or so much of said 5 per cent as may be needed; and all the residue of said fund shall be devoted to the construction and maintenance of wagon roads, bridges, and trails in said district: And provided further, That the clerk of the court of each judicial division of said district is authorized, and he is hereby directed, whenever considered necessary, to call upon the United States marshal of said judicial division to aid in the collection of said license moneys by designating regular or special deputies of his office to act as temporary license inspectors, and it shall be the duty of said United States marshal to render such aid; and the said regular or special deputies, while actually engaged in the performance of this duty, shall receive the same fees and allowances and be paid in the same manner as when performing their regular duties."

SEC. 2. That section 2 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That there shall be a board of road commissioners in said district, to be composed of an engineer officer of the United States Army, to be detailed and appointed by the Secretary of War, and two other officers of that part of the Army stationed in said district and to be designated by the Secretary of War. The said engineer officer shall, during the term of his said detail and appointment, abide in said district. The said board shall have the power, and it shall be their duty, upon their own motion or upon petition, to locate, lay out, construct, and maintain wagon roads and pack trails from any point on the navigable waters of said district to any town, mining or other industrial camp or settlement, or between any such town, camps, or settlements therein, if in their judgment such roads or trails are needed and will be of permanent value for the development of the district; but no such road or trail shall be constructed to any town, camp, or settlement which is wholly transitory or of no substantial value or importance for mining, trade, agricultural, or manufacturing purposes. The said board shall prepare maps, plans, and specifications of every road or trail they may locate and lay out, and whenever more than $20,000 in the aggregate shall have to be expended upon the actual construction of any road or section of road designed to be permanent, contract for the work shall be let by them to the lowest responsible bidder, upon sealed bids, after due notice, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War. The board may reject any bid if they deem the same unreasonably high or if they find that there is a combination among bidders. In case no responsible and reasonable bid can be secured, then the work may be carried on with material and men procured and hired by the board. The engineer officer of the board shall in all cases supervise the work of construction and see that the same is properly performed. As soon as any road or trail laid out by the board has been constructed and completed they shall examine the same and make a full and detailed report of the work done on the same to the Secretary of War, and in such report they shall state whether the road or trail has been completed conformably to the maps, plans, and specifications of the same. It shall be the duty of said board, as far as practicable, to keep in proper repair all roads and trails constructed under their supervision, and the same rules as to the manner in which the work of repair shall be done, whether by contract or otherwise, shall govern as in the case of the original construction of the road or trail. The cost and expenses of laying out, constructing, and repairing such roads and trails shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, through the authorized disbursing officer of the board designated by the Secretary of War, out of the road and trail portion of said 'Alaska fund' upon vouchers approved and certified by said board. The Secretary of the Treasury shall, at the end of each month, send by mail to each of the members of said board a statement of the amount available of said 'Alaska fund' for the construction and repair of roads and trails, and no greater liability for construction or repair shall at any time be incurred by said board than the money available therefor at that time in said fund. The members of said board shall, in addition to their salaries, be reimbursed in the sums actually paid or incurred by them in traveling expenses in the performance of their duties, and shall be entitled to receive their actual expenses of living while serving as members of said board within the limits of the district and not stationed at a military post."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

There was no demand for a second.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the bill was passed.

SETTING ASIDE PUBLIC LANDS IN HAWAII.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 10106) providing for the setting aside for governmental purposes of certain ground in Hilo, Hawaii, with the committee amendment.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all of the public land contained in block C, situated in the city of Hilo, island and Territory of Hawaii, be, and the same is hereby, set apart and declared to be a Government reservation and site for a Federal building or buildings, the same being more particularly described as the area contained in the following lines, to wit: Beginning at the west corner of Waianuenue and Bridge streets, the coordinates of which point are 3,373.1 feet north and 2,911.81 feet east of Halai trigonometrical station, and running by true azimuths 56 degrees 48 minutes 396.62 feet along Waianuenue street; 148 degrees 55 minutes 330 feet along Pitman street; 231 degrees 400.17 feet along Wailuku street; 328 degrees 55 minutes 370.47 feet along Bridge street to the point of beginning, and containing 3.19 acres, excepting therefrom so much of said tract as has been deeded to the Hilo Masonic Association of the Territory of Hawaii: Provided, That the superintendent of public works of the Territory of Hawaii is hereby authorized and directed to sell or otherwise dispose of whatever buildings are now located on the above-described reservation, in such manner as he may find most advantageous, such sale and removal to be made as rapidly as the existing leases on said ground expire, and the proceeds thereof to be applied by the superintendent of public works to the parking and general improvement of said Federal building site.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

There was no demand for a second.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the bill was passed.

PUBLICITY OF THE RECORD OF SPECIAL TAX RECEIPT HOLDERS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 14968) to amend the internal-revenue laws, so as to provide publicity of its records, a bill of my colleague (Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi) which he has already explained to the House.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 3 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and hereby is, amended in section 3240, so as to read:

"SEC. 3240. Each collector of internal revenue shall, under regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, place and keep conspicuously in his office, for public inspection, an alphabetical list of the names of all persons who shall have paid special taxes within his district, and shall state thereon the time, place, and business for which such special taxes have been paid, and upon application of any person he shall furnish a certified copy thereof, as of a public record, for which a fee of $1 for each 100 words or fraction thereof in the copy or copies so requested may be charged.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ascertain, if possible, whether or not there is a quorum present? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and seventy Members, a quorum is present. Is a second demanded?

There was no demand for a second.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the bill was passed.

ALLOTMENT OF TRIBAL INDIAN FUNDS.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 5290) providing for the allotment and distribution of tribal funds, with the amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, from time to time, to designate any individual Indian belonging to any tribe or tribes whom he may deem to be sufficiently advanced in civilization to be capable of managing his or her own affairs, and he may cause to be apportioned and allotted to any such Indian his or her pro rata share of any tribal or trust funds on deposit in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the tribe or tribes of which said Indian is a member, and said amount shall be placed to the credit of such Indian upon the books of the Treasury, and the same shall be paid to such Indian at such times and in such manner as the President may direct: Provided, That no apportionment or allotment shall be made to any Indian until such Indian has first made an application therefor; and before any portion thereof is paid such Indian shall file a release of any further interest in the tribal or trust funds of such tribe or tribes of which he may be a member, such release to cover any funds that may thereafter be deposited to the credit of such tribe or tribes.

SEC. 2. That the President shall, by Executive order, prescribe rules and regulations to carry out the purposes of this act. Such regulations may also provide the method and proceedings for the distribution of the share of any allottee who may die before payment and after such allotment on the books of the Treasury Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. LACEY. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from New York to twenty minutes.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LACEY. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska for a question.

Mr. HINSHAW. The bill says that after an allotment has been made any funds that may come into the tribal fund can not be allotted to that particular person who has received his allotment. Does the gentleman think that that would debar allottees from any considerable fund that might hereafter be apportioned?

Mr. LACEY. In any instance of that kind, where the allottee might fear anything of that kind he need not apply for his allotment.

Mr. HINSHAW. The chances are that any allottee would have knowledge of any funds that were coming into the tribal fund and so could protect himself?

Mr. LACEY. Oh, yes; and that was the reason the committee remodeled the bill.

Mr. HINSHAW. I think it is a very meritorious bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

Mr. LACEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Must the Indian have land allotted before he can apply for the allotment of the funds?

Mr. LACEY. In all cases Indians can have the land allotted under existing law, but there is no law in which they can have their share in the tribal fund allotted, and this authorizes the proceeding and designating from time to time such Indians as are capable of managing their own funds. Of course under existing law land allotments may be made to men who are not capable of handling their money, because the land allotments will be to them without any power of alienation in many instances for twenty-five years, and thus they may be protected. Of course this bill will apply only to those Indians whose intelligence would entitle them to handle their own affairs. There are a great many Indians of that kind, many of them well-educated men. I have in mind some gentlemen who are college graduates, men engaged in the professions, men of a high order of intelligence and education, whose money is tied up in these tribal funds and who would no doubt be at once designated to withdraw their share of the fund and be relieved entirely from governmental guardianship thereafter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As I recollect the law regarding the allotment of lands, that can be done by the President, but no Indian can apply and have an allotment of land made to him.

Mr. LACEY. Yes; an Indian can apply for an allotment on the public lands where he does not belong or is not attached to any specific tribe. There is a general law by which he may be allotted on the public domain, but nearly all the allotments of lands to Indians grow out of treaties or some arrangement being made to break up the reservation and give to the individuals farms to begin with and dispose thereafter of the remainder of the land for settlement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Iowa does not believe that it would be possible for any Indian to have his share of tribal funds allotted to him previous to having an allotment of lands, where the tribe holds certain lands.

Mr. LACEY. It is not at all likely, because provisions for allotment of lands are so much more liberal and easy than this would be. This would carry out in a general way to competent Indians practically what was done with the Kaw Indians. Their money has all been divided, and they are all now citizens on their farms.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would say to the gentleman that with him I favored some such bill, but I was in favor of incorporating into the bill to be passed a provision that no Indian could have an allotment of tribal funds made unless he at the time had an allotment of lands.

Mr. LACEY. Well, the individual Indian must first make his application, and when it is found that he is entirely capable of handling these funds, the President then may designate him. I think the bill does not go as far as my friend from New York would have gone, and certainly not as far as I would have gone if I could have had my own way about it, but it is a step in the right direction of eliminating a considerable number of Indians, who are not only citizens, but intelligent and capable citizens and able to take care of their own affairs.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, one more question. This provides, does it, that all the funds are to be allotted and no reservation to be made of school funds or any part of the whole fund, to be kept back for Indian schools?

Mr. LACEY. The funds in question are trust funds, belonging to certain tribes. One tribe has a large fund and another a small fund. From year to year the interest on those funds has been paid out in annuities to various Indians. This proposes, as the money really belongs to them and the Government is only a trustee, that certain designated Indians, who are capable of managing their own affairs, will draw their share out of that fund, and that then such allottees will all drop into the common mass of American citizenship.

Mr. HINSHAW. The entire fund is divided pro rata? That is, so that the particular Indian gets his pro-rata share of the entire fund?

Mr. LACEY. At the time of the division; yes.

Mr. HINSHAW. And it does not in any way affect the lands which have been or will hereafter be allotted.

Mr. LACEY. Not at all. I might add that this bill has been carefully considered by the Indian Bureau, and the Bureau would like to have gone much further than this bill goes, but it certainly is good as far as it goes. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to use any time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

BOUNDARY RESERVATION AT HOT SPRINGS, ARK.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 8976) to change the line of the reservation at Hot Springs, Ark., and of Reserve avenue, and move to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the line of the Government reservation at Hot Springs, Ark., and of Reserve avenue, be changed so as to run from stone monument 26 to stone monument 28 on a direct line, instead of running from 26 to 27 and thence to 28, as it now does: Provided, That the tract of land thus excluded from the reservation by changing the lines as above be ceded to the city of Hot Springs, to become a part of Reserve avenue and to be used for street purposes only; to be accepted by the city without change of the opposite (southerly) boundary line of said avenue.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of obtaining an explanation I will demand a second. This bill just donates to the town certain land for street purposes?

Mr. ROBINSON. I can not hear the gentleman, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does this bill simply donate to the city——

Mr. ROBINSON. It does not donate anything. This bill simply changes the line of one street in the city of Hot Springs. It is made necessary because it is on the reservation and is under the control of the Interior Department. The bill is recommended by the Interior Department, the War Department, and unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Lands. The superintendent of the reservation writing about the bill says, among other things, "the bill is all right and will materially improve both the reservation and the street."

Mr. WILLIAMS. What it does, then, is simply to give permission to take some more of the reservation for an addition to the street?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No, sir; it does not do that. It changes the line of the street. It straightens out a crooked street in the city of Hot Springs. It is intended to beautify the street.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And in doing that, of course, it gives some of the street to the reservation and some of the reservation to the street?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No, sir; under the amendment that is adopted the line of the reservation is not changed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it does not touch the reservation or take some of the reservation, what has the Federal Government to do with it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The gentleman from Mississippi will understand the street on the reservation is part of the reservation, so it is not affected except as to one side of the street. It does change the line, but does not take anything off the reservation.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Does not broaden it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; it straightens out the street. The street runs from stone monument 26 to stone monument 27 and then to stone monument 28, and this bill merely straightens it out and runs the line direct from stone monument 26 to stone monument 28 on the reservation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, as I understand, it does as I thought.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not know what the gentleman thought.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It straightens the street and, by straightening it out, all the street now being upon the reservation, the Government takes some land now in the street over to the balance of the reservation and takes some of the balance of the reservation over for the new street.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Well, I do not think that is true, because it provides that the southern boundary line shall not be changed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does it change the northern boundary line?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, in changing it, of course it takes in some more land, does it not?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes, sir; but the whole street is on the reservation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, if the whole of the line is on the reservation, it takes in some more of the reservation?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am utterly unable to understand what the gentleman is driving at.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was trying to arrive at the connection between the bill and the Federal Government. Now, if I understand, the whole street is upon the reservation?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the interest the Federal Government has in it is this, that without the consent of the Federal Government the line of the street can not be changed so as to go upon some part of the reservation not now in the street?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I have been asking and trying to ascertain. I have no objection to the bill at all, and I withdraw the demand for a second.

The question was taken; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the bill was passed.

FORT BRADY MILITARY RESERVATION, SAULT STE. MARIE, MICH.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill S. 2801, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2801) to withhold from sale a portion of Fort Brady Military Reservation, at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich.

Be it enacted, etc., That that portion of the military reservation known as Fort Brady, in the city (late village) of Sault Ste. Marie, in the State of Michigan, bounded on the north by that part of Water street adjacent to the Government park, on the east by Brady street, on the south by Portage avenue, and on the west by Bingham avenue, be, and the same is hereby, reserved from sale under the authority of the act of Congress authorizing the sale of Old Fort Brady, approved July 8, 1886, and that the same be set apart for a site for a public building at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

A second not being demanded, the question was taken; and, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

COUNTY OF CLINTON, IOWA.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 18330) entitled "An act transferring the county of Clinton, in the State of Iowa, from the northern judicial district of Iowa to the southern judicial district of Iowa."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Clinton, in the State of Iowa, be, and the same is hereby, transferred from the northern judicial district of the United States circuit and district courts for the State of Iowa to the southern judicial district of the United States circuit and districts courts of the said State of Iowa, and that the said county of Clinton be, and the same is hereby, made a part of the Davenport division of the said southern judicial district of Iowa.

SEC. 2. That all civil process issued against persons resident in the said county of Clinton and cognizable before the United States courts shall be made returnable to the courts, respectively, to be held at the city of Davenport, Iowa, and all prosecutions for offenses committed in said county of Clinton shall be tried in the appropriate United States courts at the city of Davenport, Iowa: Provided, That no process issued or prosecution commenced or suit instituted before the passage of this act shall be in any way affected by the provisions hereof.

The SPEAKER. Is there a second demanded?

No second being demanded, the question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

HOMESTEADS TO NATIVES OF ALASKA.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and put upon its passage the bill (S. 5537) entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to allot homesteads to the natives of Alaska."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered, in his discretion and under such rules as he may prescribe, to allot not to exceed 160 acres of nonmineral land in the district of Alaska to any Indian or Eskimo of full or mixed blood who resides in and is a native of said district, and who is the head of a family, or is 21 years of age; and the land so allotted shall be deemed the homestead of the allottee and his heirs in perpetuity, and shall be inalienable and nontaxable until otherwise provided by Congress. Any person qualified for an allotment as aforesaid shall have the preference right to secure by allotment the nonmineral land occupied by him not exceeding 160 acres.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

No second being demanded, the question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

CLAIM OF THE UNITED STATES AGAINST THE STATE OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 3436) to provide for the settlement of the claim of the United States against the State of Michigan for moneys held by said State as trustee for the United States in connection with St. Marys Falls Ship Canal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the payment by the State of Michigan of $68,927.12 into the Treasury of the United States, the Attorney-General be, and is hereby, authorized to settle and dismiss from the Supreme Court of the United States a suit in equity now pending therein in which the United States is complainant and the State of Michigan is defendant, and to relinquish all further claims against said State, including interest upon said amount, which have arisen by reason of its trust in constructing and operating St. Marys Falls Ship Canal and locks: Provided, That such payment is made within ninety days from the passage and approval of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to inquire if this bill is reported by the committee?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir. It has been reported by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Speaker, the State of Michigan began as early as 1850 to urge upon Congress some method of developing the vast mineral, timber, and grain resources of upper Michigan, northern Wisconsin and Minnesota in a commercial way through the improvement of St. Marys River, the outlet from Superior to Huron. At that time Government lands were considered worth scarcely anything. The only method of reaching that northern region was through its waterways, and navigation was stifled, to a large extent, because the great and valuable products of that country were of such bulk and character that they could not be conveniently subjected to portage round the Falls of St. Marys. Men of advanced ideas and comprehensive prevision saw the vast opportunities for the welfare of the country that could be made available by a short canal and a lock to avoid the cataract and let the commerce of the Great Lakes, up and down, pass through the St. Marys River.

The question of State action upon the part of Michigan was carefully considered, but in that early day it had no resources either of property or others that could be made available by State taxation to do this work. The legislature, inspired by the influence of prominent men, memorialized Congress for a grant of lands for the purpose of this work, and the act of August 26, 1852, passed, appropriating to Michigan 750,000 acres of land for the enterprise. It was the most judicious grant from the public domain ever made. The State took up the trust under careful restriction, used the land, and accomplished the purpose. The canal became operative about 1855, and from that time onward until 1882 it was operated by the State of Michigan—a period of about twenty-seven years.

No trust in the interest of the people was probably ever managed with such skill, economy, and beneficial results as this one. Not a dollar was lost in the disposal of the lands which were practically exchanged for the construction of a finished canal and lock. The charges for toll through the canal were kept to the very minimum of expenditure in care and maintenance. The canal board, charged by the State with its management, served without salary above actual expenses. The superintendent was paid only such a meager salary as furnished him comfortable days' wages. The collector, employed only during the season of navigation, always served at a compensation that would now be regarded as small for an ordinary clerk in the Departments here. The toll was thus reduced to a very minimum upon the commerce passing through the canal. The difficult, and at times hazardous, work of maintenance and repair was reduced in expense to the lowest possible sum, and during these twenty-seven years of the upbuilding of a great freighting business the State of Michigan as a government never profited a dollar by reason of its trust.

Had the State of Michigan alone been benefited through its development by the great work accomplished, there would probably now have been no reason for asking relief at the hands of Congress; but a brief résumé will serve to show that it was only relatively benefited, and that the entire northern portion of the United States was to a greater or less degree the recipient of benefits from this work. While at first the iron and copper regions of the upper peninsula of Michigan were rendered productive and their development made possible, very rapidly other interests became involved, viz, the mineral resources of northern Wisconsin and northeastern Minnesota, the vast pine regions of the same States, and very soon the great wheat fields of Minnesota and the Dakotas felt the influence of the commerce over this waterway. Almost the entire copper output of the country, which built up to a great degree the wealth of Boston and other portions of New England, the iron ore which developed Cleveland, Erie (Pa.), and to some extent Pittsburg, the great steel and iron interests of Milwaukee and Chicago—all these were produced as the result of this canal. Emigrants from the east to the northwest availed themselves of it; supplies from New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin, all were shipped up into the Lake Superior country to a large and constantly increasing extent, until at the time the canal was turned over to the General Government the volume had increased with such rapidity and to such a magnitude that it was difficult to realize the full measure of importance attained by and through the St. Marys Canal.

Then came in the vast lumber interests. Probably no finer bodies of timber were ever brought into use for the upbuilding of all the country tributary to the Erie Canal to the territory in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and all the States lying west of the same, than that which border upon or lie adjacent to Lake Superior. Lumber cut from these forests was distributed over the entire northern half of the country as far west as the Rocky Mountains, to a greater or less degree. But along about 1880 the great increase in the use of this canal, the improvements in widening and deepening the St. Clair flats near Detroit and the St. Marys River below the canal, made necessary a new and marked departure from the comparatively limited capacity of its original construction. This was recognized by the people of all the States involved in the lake-carrying trade, and it was unselfishly recognized by the State of Michigan. Exercising the mere trust in the premises, it was probably not within the constitutional power of the State of Michigan to levy taxes upon its inhabitants and property to construct a greater and enlarged canal and locks. It was not, strictly speaking, a State work. The State had merely acted as trustee for the General Government. It could not justify the diversion of funds from its own people to improve or facilitate the operations of a matter in which it was a trustee and in which other States (in fact a large portion of the United States) were being relatively benefited, and yet the conditions of commerce required a forward movement.

Having never benefited a penny and having unselfishly carried on and executed its trust, Michigan, through its legislature, proposed to put the canal back into the hands of the General Government, which alone had the means and power to deal with the situation in a way commensurate with its importance.

Had the General Government surrendered all claim of the State to the property in question, the State might then have proceeded to create a great improvement which would have been to it and to its citizens a financial success as a money-making institution, but no such thing was contemplated for a moment by the State, nor was the United States Government, through its officers in charge of the improvements upon the Great Lakes, in sympathy with such a course, and Congress, had it been proposed, would undoubtedly have been met at once by the united forces of all the other States immediately benefited, and properly so. Moreover, St. Marys River is a Federal—in fact, an international—stream. Without, therefore, putting in any bill for its great care and meritorious services, without asking for a dollar for remuneration for the execution of its trust in the commendable way already set forth, it was decided to turn over to the General Government the work as it was, in excellent condition. Even the tools that had been used were surrendered, and the money which had been collected and was then on hand, amounting to about $68,000, was also ready to be turned over, when called for by the General Government, as a part of the assets of the canal and of the trust.

A proviso was made in the resolution of the Michigan legislature that money should be devoted to the construction of a dry dock, which was then greatly needed for the benefit of commerce in that region, none of any consequence being available nearer than Detroit or Chicago, and navigation in the upper ends of Lakes Huron and Michigan and in all Lake Superior being subject at all times to greater or less difficulty and danger to the vessel interests.

The Federal Government accepted and took over the canal. It paid no attention to the proviso of the Michigan legislature even as an appeal to its generosity. It never constructed any dry dock, and, what is more, it never called for the money. Had it been a private individual or corporation submitting a trust to a trustee involving twenty-seven years of continuous exercise of a trust function, but leaving for eighteen years thereafter what was left of the trust in the hands of a trustee without calling for it, it would have probably been conceded in any court of equity that the trustee was entitled to retain the funds thus left in its hands, and such undoubtedly was the construction of the matter placed upon it by the Michigan legislature in 1897, after the money had lain in the treasury of Michigan for fifteen years, when such legislature passed the resolution transferring this $68,000 to the general fund of the State. In fact, however, not until about 1901 was any such claim made, and none would probably ever have been made had it not been for the mistaken sense of duty upon the part of a resident of Sault Ste. Marie, who called the attention of the Attorney-General to the existence of this fund and suggested that the State be called upon for the fund, and that Congress devote it to the purpose of constructing a marine hospital, which was very much needed at that place. Having thus been stirred up, the Government decided to demand of the State authorities the fund in question and asserted its right of ownership of the same.

It was even a consideration upon which lawyers were not entirely agreed as to whether it was a trust at all. In other words, whether the terms of the act of Congress appropriating to the State of Michigan the 750,000 acres of land were not an actual grant to that State for its own State improvements. So strongly was this question debated that the State so claimed in its answer to the bill in equity, filed by its attorney-general, and upon these lines the case was decided by the United States Supreme Court in favor of the Government. Upon various theories of the lawyers of the Department of Justice, the interest upon this fund during all these years would reach somewhere between thirty and fifty thousand dollars, depending upon what theory the court might decide was the proper one to apply. But at the very outside figure the amount of this interest which Congress is now asking to relieve the State from paying, in case the Supreme Court should hold in favor of the Government, for the twenty-seven years the State was building and managing this canal, would not be an allowance to the State of more than $2,000 per year for what it did. And the United States and the world at large had received incalculable benefits from that work, without any effort, without even a shadow of concern, without sweating a hair, without a feeling being ruffled. But Michigan, which took upon itself and carried the burden, accomplished the work and deserved the merit and the gratitude of the entire country for its faithful performance of its duty, is now pursued by the Government of the United States to the last pound of flesh and last drop of blood.

By the terms of the proposed bill it is required to pay over the money on hand, and if this bill should not be passed and the court should hold in favor of the Government on this question of interest, it would be required and exacted that it should actually pay for the privilege of rendering such a service to civilization.

Such a course is not in keeping with the character of the General Government, which has ever been broad, generous, and liberal in dealing with its people and with its States and Territories, without regard to the merits of their claims.

At the lowest rate of computation adopted by the commissioner who made the computations in this case, it would be scarcely more than $1,000 per year to the State for the twenty-seven years of its service as trustee, and this does not take into account at all the expenses of its attorneys in defending it thus far in a litigation which has been to some extent expensive.

But it may be claimed and stated that the Government, through its attorneys in the Department of Justice, went to the State authorities before beginning the litigation, with an offer of compromise of the claim upon the basis of receiving just the principal of the sum involved, and it may be charged to the discredit of the State that it did not agree upon such a basis.

But this situation confronted them. An attorney-general of the State had expressed the opinion that the act of Congress conferred an actual grant to the State, and there was no trust involved, and that the State had perfect title to the money in question, and naturally it followed that the payment of any portion of it would be an act of injustice. Under such circumstances neither the governor nor the State board of auditors felt that it would be proper for them to go contrary to such an opinion and to the apparent intent of the legislature in converting the money to the general fund, without some proper decision of a court of competent jurisdiction to the effect that the State was liable. In other words, as proper conservators of the interest of the State they could not see their way clear to take the law into their own hands and decide upon a question that was contested, in so far as to attempt to pay a claim which might or might not prove to be a just and valid one.

Nearly fifty years have elapsed since the trust was created. These proceedings had passed beyond the recollection of most of the people in being, and probably all of those engaged actively in the affairs of the State, and a degree of uncertainty, which was reasonable warrant for the refusal upon their part, naturally obtained. Few men in official life would feel like disposing of the public money under such circumstances, and it is my idea that the State took a perfectly proper view of the condition as it presented itself to them and nothing should be resolved against it on account of that refusal.

It may again be said that the equities involved in this case—that is, the interest part of it—is before the Supreme Court for disposal, and that court should be allowed to dispose of them; in other words, pass upon them. At first blush this might seem to be very clear and, to an extent, argumentative, but after a moment's consideration we of Congress (and the members of the Judiciary Committee have so considered) will reflect that the mere questions as to whether money lying unclaimed for a long period of time, under such a set of circumstances as are here disclosed, should in equity be required to draw interest, and the further question that whether interest can be claimed as against the State, even upon an equitable claim, without express affirmative legislation by the legislature of that State, and such other questions as might arise as purely appertaining to equity jurisprudence.

These, and these only, are before the court for its disposal. But it is clearly true that the broader equitable consideration, based upon the purely public morality of the affair of whether Congress ought to hold Michigan up sharply and with a round turn and demand every last penny from her, without conceding anything for the great and beneficial work initiated, finished, and operated for twenty-seven years, might not be commensurate, at least with the interest, upon this small sum of money for a lesser period after the Federal Government assumed charge. This question is purely for Congress, which has the power to give and the power to take away that which belongs of strict right to the Federal Government according to its own sovereign will and pleasure.

The question whether we shall be niggardly, exacting, and clearly unjust; whether we shall disregard good morals and fair dealing, that question is here now in the hands of the Congress.

Let us suppose a private corporation in expectation of receiving a great benefit therefrom, decided to outlay upon an improvement approximately a million of dollars' worth of lands which it owned—750,000 acres in amount of presumable value of $1.25 per acre—should take these lands and put them into the hands of a lesser corporation for the purpose of accomplishing this work and go away and leave the matter to be cared for without let or hindrance. Suppose this lesser corporation, as trustee, should honestly and economically make use of every foot of the land for the purpose designed, accomplish the work, and then proceed for a period of twenty-seven years to operate the improvement to the great and lasting benefit of the larger corporation, according to the trust. At the close of the work the trust is surrendered in excellent condition and in the high tide of prosperity, and a sum of $68,000 be found on hand. Suppose the larger corporation should then leave the $68,000 in the hands of the trustee corporation for a period of upward of eighteen years, without saying anything about it at all, and then call upon the trustee for the money, exacting it through a court at law, and then say, in addition, I demand the use of that money during this eighteen years and I decline to allow you any credit whatever for your services during these twenty-seven years of active service in my interest, or for your safe-keeping of this money during the eighteen years more in which I did not call for the money.

What would be thought of the greater corporation? What would be the feeling of the trustee, or lesser corporation? What would be the opinion of the people outside concerning such a transaction? This is the real question before Congress. The court can pass upon the pleadings and the law as they stand, according to the rules of equity jurisprudence, but at the bar of public opinion, and whether at the bar of public opinion or not, in good conscience and good morals we should seek to pass upon this question and decide it according to the very right of the case. In other words, had the attorneys and counselors of Michigan, after the decision of the demurrer in this case, proceeded to answer and set up what they did, and make a charge or claim for compensation for the services of the State as trustee during these periods, it is quite possible that a different case in equity would be presented to the court. Not having shown that, however, is it not entirely possible that we can settle that matter here and now without further troubling the court, and upon a proper and reasonable basis?

I have said that the State of Michigan conceived, brought forth, and reared to the highest degree of usefulness a great national—yea, international—improvement, and without profit to herself. If, instead of administering the affairs pertaining to the construction and operation of the canal during more than a quarter of a century, through a board composed of men of highest business and moral integrity, who received not a dollar as compensation, she had paid these men what their services were worth and what she had a right to pay them, the State would not only not have had a fund to turn over to the Federal Government, but larger tolls would have been imposed upon the country's commerce. When the State turned over the canal it was employing but twenty men. Almost immediately the number was increased, and in 1905 about 100 men were employed. Economy and integrity were Michigan's watchwords, and her trust was surrendered unblemished by even the taint of fraud, corruption, or incompetency.

When she undertook the work, in 1852, the prophecy of the stupendous commerce of the future was but an annual traffic of about 12,000 tons, which by portage was carried around St. Marys Falls. Michigan turned over to the country and humanity more than one and one-half millions of tons in 1881, which had been gathered not largely from Michigan industries, but from the fields and forests and mines of the Northwest and carried not to the citizens of Michigan, but more generally to the manufacturing cities of Lake Erie and the farther East. That one and one-half millions of tons has now increased to over 50,000,000 tons. Down over the highway whose foundations Michigan laid there has been carried since 1855 about $5,000,000,000 worth of products to enrich the world and contribute more than any other one thing to the progress and prosperity of the United States.

In view of this great benefit which Michigan brought to our people; of the economy and integrity with which the trust was executed; of the fact that the State, as expressed in the act transferring the canal to the Federal Government, expected that a dry dock would be built within her borders; of the fact that the parties to the transfer in 1883 evidently intended that not even the principal of the canal fund should be turned over and that no demand was made for more than eighteen years; of the fact that the Federal Government never pays interest on a claim and can not rightfully collect interest from a State without the consent of the legislature of a State—in view of all the equities in the case I most earnestly urge the passage of this bill.

No second being demanded, the question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS TALLAHATCHIE RIVER.

Mr. SPIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 18439) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tallahatchie River, in Tallahatchie County, Miss.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SPIGHT] moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the board of supervisors of Tallahatchie County, State of Mississippi, a municipal corporation under the laws of the State of Mississippi, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a wagon bridge and approaches thereto, across the Tallahatchie River at or near Jarman Ferry, in Tallahatchie County, in the State of Mississippi, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

No second being demanded, the question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

CERTIFICATES OF NATURALIZATION.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 18713) to validate certain certificates of naturalization.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That naturalization certificates issued after the act approved March 3, 1903, entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States," went into effect, which fail to show that the courts issuing said certificates complied with the requirements of section 39 of said act, but which were otherwise lawfully issued, are hereby declared to be as valid as though said certificates complied with said section, but shall not be by this act further validated or legalized.

SEC. 2. That all the records relating to naturalization, all declarations of intention to become citizens of the United States, and all certificates of naturalization filed, recorded, or issued prior to the time when this act takes effect in or from any court having a clerk and a seal shall for all purposes be deemed to be and to have been made, filed, recorded, or issued by a court with jurisdiction to naturalize aliens, but shall not be by this act further validated or legalized.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to twenty minutes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I understand that the gentleman from Mississippi desires an explanation of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Indeed, I do.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, this bill is in two sections, and is necessary in order to cure two defects growing out of our present system of naturalization. By section 39 of the immigration bill of 1903 it was provided that every court naturalizing an alien should insert in the certificate the fact that the man had been examined as to whether he had been an anarchist or not. If the insertion was not made, the certificate was void. The State courts throughout the country, not being officially notified of this requirement, almost uniformly failed to insert the proper words in their certificates, and every day they are getting here in the State Department certificates of naturalization issued since that law was passed which do not contain that language on their face, and therefore, by the terms of the law, are void. It simply means that lots of young men from Germany and Ireland and Scotland, and such places as that—more particularly France and Germany, where they have the military service—can not go back and visit their homes, because they will be liable to military service and can not get a passport.

The second section of the bill relates to courts where they have been naturalizing on the theory that they were entitled to naturalize.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. How many of these cases exist, say, in the city of New York?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Well, not so many in the city of New York as in other places.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. In the State?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I suppose thousands throughout the country.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. How many came under your notice?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Not very many, because in the city of New York the courts keep up with the law; but in the rural parts, where the work is done by the county courts and where they were unadvised, because the business is not sufficient to have kept acquainted with the laws, a great many. The second section——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Then what is the purpose of the bill?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The purpose of the bill is to enable the Department of State, which asks for this bill, to issue passports to hundreds of men who are really equitably entitled to passports, but who have their naturalization certificates returned to them because they are void under the law, although the men are entitled to naturalization and have complied with every requirement of the law. The fault has been with the courts.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. If such certificate is valid on its face, it is recognized by the State Department without question.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I think if my colleague had been here when I started to explain he would have understood that under the laws the certificates are not valid on their face, and that is just the trouble, because the law says they must have on their face the language called for by section 39, and they do not have that language, and therefore they are invalid.

Mr. HEPBURN. Why is it not the easier method to go to a court and secure now proper certificates, if those they have have become invalid under the law?

Mr. BENNET of New York. In answer to the gentleman from Iowa I will say that in hundreds and thousands of cases the people never know that their certificates are invalid. In a number of States the children of an alien can not inherit his real property, and a man may have lived and voted and died under the impression that he was a naturalized citizen, and his heirs will not be able to take his real property on his death, and he will never know anything about this naturalization law.

Mr. HEPBURN. What does the bill do? Does it validate the invalid certificates or repeal the law?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It validates those invalid certificates so far as that particular provision is concerned.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to ask the gentleman from New York a question on the same line. In reading the bill hastily, it has occurred to me whether it does not validate the future issuing of naturalization papers which are alike invalid upon their face, and whether naturalization papers hereafter will continue to be corrected in that way?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It was not the intention.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It certainly could not have been the intention. I would like to have the bill and call attention to it directly. Now, the first section provides:

That naturalization certificates issued after the act approved March 3, 1903, entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States," went into effect, which failed to show that the courts issuing said certificates complied with the requirements of section 39 of said act, but which were otherwise lawfully issued, are hereby declared to be as valid as though said certificates complied with said section, but shall not be by this act further validated or legalized.

Mr. BENNET of New York. That is, having no other effect.

Mr. BONYNGE. The bill clearly applies to that which has heretofore occurred. The language is all in the past tense, and therefore could be construed only to relate to cases occurring prior to the passage of the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That all relates to naturalization certificates already given. It is not drawn exactly the same way in the second section. I suppose a fair construction of it is that it only applies to those already issued that did not comply with section 39.

Mr. BENNET of New York. As to the second section, Mr. Speaker, courts all over the Union have been naturalizing aliens, and as to some of them there has been a question as to their jurisdiction. The State Department has information that there are between 60,000 and 70,000 persons now voting in the United States, or who are believed to be entitled to vote under the idea that they are citizens, who are deemed to be citizens, but who have invalid certificates because of the failure of the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand that the defect in the naturalization comes from the lack of information on the part of the court that the law of 1903 went into operation upon its passage, and that the courts throughout the country were provided with the ordinary blank certificates of the old form, and continued to use them without any investigation of the change of the law.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Exactly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And that this bill is designed to validate the certificates that were issued under those circumstances.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Exactly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And the Department of State recommends the enactment of legislation.

Mr. BONYNGE. If the gentleman will pardon me, not the Department of State, but the commission that was appointed by the President to make recommendations for the revision of the naturalization laws does recommend the validating of the certificates, which upon their face are invalid because of this omission required by the act.

Mr. BENNET of New York. And the passport bureau in the Department of State, which has to deal with this question, recommends the legislation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have no doubt that there are a number of instances of this sort in the district which I have the honor to represent. I think the bill ought to pass.

Mr. HINSHAW. These omissions were in reference to the questions which the judge should ask the applicant in regard to his attitude of mind toward the Government—his moral character, and so forth?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The judge may have asked the questions, but the law went further and said that must appear on the face of the certificate.

Mr. HINSHAW. I have in mind a case where I assisted in the naturalization of a gentleman who went abroad, and who had difficulty while there, because his passport was not properly made out. And this will probably remedy any such difficulties hereafter.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes. This bill validates those certificates which were otherwise lawfully issued, but which failed to show that the courts issuing them complied with the requirements of the act.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Does this first section seek to make valid the naturalization papers hereafter issued?

Mr. BENNET of New York. No.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Where in the law is that prohibited?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It relates entirely to the past, and of course could not speak for the future.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. It could by repealing the provisions of the other law.

Mr. BENNET of New York. But it does not repeal them.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. It would unless there is something here to the contrary.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Not at all. It is just a validating section. It leaves the other section in force. It is all in the past tense.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Would it not be well to insert in line 3, section 1, between the word "certificates" and the word "issued," the word "heretofore?"

Mr. BENNET of New York. If it was not for the word "were" in line 8, it might be, but I do not think it is either necessary or advisable. It says, "but which were otherwise lawfully issued," and you can not use the word "were" in reference to the future.

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] such time as he may require.

Mr. MANN. I introduced the original bill for which this bill was introduced by the committee as a substitute. The bill that I originally introduced has reference to the matters referred to in section 2 of this bill. It developed two or three years ago that in the city of Chicago the criminal court of Cook County had issued between 20,000 and 30,000 certificates of naturalization. The law on the subject of naturalization provides that naturalization papers may be issued in a court of common-law jurisdiction. The criminal court of Cook County is a court of criminal jurisdiction, presided over by judges assigned to it from other courts of common-law jurisdiction. Whether it is technically a court of common-law jurisdiction has never been definitely settled by any authority, and doubt arose as to whether that court was a court of common-law jurisdiction. Hence they ceased issuing naturalization certificates. I have been informed that the same condition of affairs occurred in St. Louis. It certainly exists in some of the other large cities of the country. So there were in our own county between 20,000 and 30,000 certificates of naturalization issued by a court which purported to have full jurisdiction; papers accepted by people who assumed that they were citizens, who still consider themselves citizens, many of whom are still voting as citizens. Probably not one of them has ever been informed that there is any doubt about the legality of his certificate of naturalization. They complied with all the provisions of the law.

The criminal court is a court of equal jurisdiction, so far as its standing is concerned, with any of the other courts which could issue certificates of naturalization; and the second section of this bill is simply to provide that as to the question of jurisdiction a court which has acted in this matter shall be considered to have had jurisdiction.

It has been asked here, can not these persons go into court and each one of them have it corrected? That would involve new applications for citizenship in each case, and that of itself would be an acknowledgment that the party was not a citizen before, and would render him liable to prosecution for illegal voting, or possibly for perjury; and the only fair method by which this can be corrected, both as to these people and as to their heirs in case the question of citizenship comes up hereafter in descent of real estate, is by the passage of a corrective act such as this.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is it not true that a large majority of the holders of this kind of certificates do not know, as a matter of fact, that there is any defect in them, and probably never will know it?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is right. I do not suppose that one-tenth of 1 per cent of those who have been naturalized in the criminal court in Cook County have ever known that any question has arisen about it. It has not been advertised in our city. There is no occasion for disturbing these people, and the clerk of the court two or three years ago came to the conclusion that the court ought to stop issuing naturalization papers. He was the one who first prepared the bill which I introduced originally on the subject.

Mr. GARRETT. I would like to ask the gentleman if this practice still goes on? I do not mean in the gentleman's city, but I mean generally.

Mr. MANN. I think generally the practice has been stopped; that is my information, that when the question was raised as to the jurisdiction the practice ceased. It is not certain, however, that the court does not have common-law jurisdiciton. The matter has never been definitely settled and perhaps never will be. These people in good faith have attempted to become citizens, and have adopted all the methods and have followed the entire course prescribed by Congress, and certainly in no event is it their fault that there is any trouble about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demanded a second for the purpose of having an explanation as to the object of the bill. It seemed to me at first blush to be rather dangerous legislation. I have come to the conclusion after the explanation has been made to the House that the bill is all right; but it does show a rather dangerous condition of things in the country at any rate. It shows that for three years the courts of the country have not been obeying the laws of the country by certifying to what they ought to have certified in naturalization certificates. But for the fact that property rights are involved, as explained by the gentleman from Illinois, I would insist that the bill ought not to be passed, that these people with invalid naturalization certificates should go to the courts and take out new naturalization papers. But it seems to me, under all the circumstances, that property rights might be involved and serious damage done to people who are not responsible for the loose way in which the court business, over which they had no control, has been done. I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct one statement made by the gentleman from Mississippi. He stated, as I understood him, that the practice has been in existence for twelve years. The defects in the certificate are defects that have occurred since the passage of the act of 1903, and therefore it is only for three years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. 1903? Then the gentleman is right. I understood that it was 1893.

Mr. BONYNGE. I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi in this respect, that as it becomes necessary to pass this bill it demonstrates clearly to my mind the necessity for the passage of the general naturalization bill now pending before the House. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE ST. ELIZABETH ASYLUM.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] is absent on account of sickness in his family. He was appointed as one of the members upon the committee to investigate the St. Elizabeth Asylum. If there be no objection, the Chair will substitute the name of Mr. WALLACE for that of Mr. PADGETT.

There was no objection.

CONSTRUCTION AND EXTENSION OF WHARVES IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass with amendments the bill (H. R. 18502) to empower the Secretary of War, under certain restrictions, to authorize the construction, extension, and maintenance of wharves, piers, and other structures on lands underlying harbor areas and navigable streams and bodies of waters in or surrounding Porto Rico and the islands adjacent thereto.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I understood the motion to be to pass the substitute.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The motion was to pass the bill with the amendments. There is a substitute to the bill and amendments to the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to pass the bill as amended, which is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And to pass the substitute with the amendments to the substitute.

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair see if the Chair understands the motion.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Clerk was reading the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the motion of the gentleman to be to pass the bill, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting a substitute for the bill with amendments.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. With amendments to the substitute.

The SPEAKER. Yes; with amendments to the substitute. Under that motion, in the opinion of the Chair, it is only necessary to read the enacting clause and the substitute with the amendments to the substitute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, this substitute as amended is the shape in which the bill comes from the committee.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say about the bill that it has the unanimous report of the Committee on Insular Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, empowered, subject to the restrictions and under the conditions hereinafter mentioned, to authorize the construction, extension, and maintenance of any wharf, pier, dolphin, boom, weir, breakwater, sea wall, bulkhead, jetty, or other structure on any of the lands belonging to the United States which underlie the harbor areas and navigable streams and bodies of waters in or surrounding Porto Rico and the islands adjacent thereto and the filling in and dredging of such lands.

SEC. 2. That the word "person," as used in this act, shall be construed to import either the singular or the plural, as the case demands, and shall include individuals, municipalities, quasi municipal corporations, corporations, companies, and associations.

SEC. 3. That the powers granted in the foregoing section shall be subject, however, to the following restrictions:

(a) No authorization to any person to construct, extend, or maintain any such structure shall continue for a longer period than the period set forth in such authorization, and shall provide that the Government of the United States or the government of Porto Rico shall have the right at any time after the expiration of thirty years from the date of such authorization, and after three months' notice, to take any such structure from the owner thereof upon paying the value of the same at the time it shall be so taken, and the amount paid shall not exceed the original cost of the same as may be fixed under paragraph (f) hereof. In case the Government of the United States or the government of Porto Rico should claim that the value of the structure when seized and taken is less than its original cost, the extent of deterioration or diminution from the original value shall be determined by a board or commission of four members, two of whom shall be appointed by the Government of the United States or the government of Porto Rico and two by the owner of such structure. If the four members thus chosen and appointed shall not be able to agree, they shall choose by mutual agreement a referee, whose decision shall be final, but in no case shall the amount to be paid exceed the original cost as fixed under the provisions of said paragraph (f). If the four members thus chosen and appointed are unable by mutual agreement to select a referee, then the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army shall be the referee, and his decision shall be final.

All authorizations granted by the Secretary of War for any such construction, extension, or maintenance

(b) Shall be subject to alteration, amendment, or repeal by Congress;

(c) Shall provide that the wharfage fees and charges for vessels, for passengers, and for goods loaded or discharged on, from, at, or over any such structure, and for approach and entry to any such structure, shall be no greater than are just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative, and for that purpose shall at all times be subject to regulation and revision by the said Secretary of War; that such fees and charges shall be the same for all persons, and all persons shall have equal right to approach, enter, and use the said structure, subject to such reasonable rules and regulations as the grantee thereof may establish, all of which rules and regulations shall be subject to revision by the Secretary of War;

(d) That all necessary dredging in or in connection with the said structure, or the use thereof, shall be made by the grantee of the authorization;

(e) That such authorization shall be null and void unless actual construction shall be commenced within one year from the date of such authorization by the Secretary of War, and completed within three years from the date of such authorization, or within such lesser periods as may be therein fixed: Provided, That the Secretary of War may for due cause shown extend the time for the completion of such construction for a reasonable period.

(f) That duly verified accounts of expenditure for the construction, extension, or improvement of such structure shall be exhibited to, and filed with, the United States Army engineer at the city of San Juan, P. R., who shall report to the Secretary of War the entire cost of such structure, extension, or improvement to be built under such authorization.

(g) That the said structure shall not be sublet, sold, transferred, or assigned, nor shall the authorization therefor be granted, sold, transferred, or assigned without the consent of the Secretary of War, nor in any case to a person engaged directly or indirectly in the same line of business in the same harbor area, navigable stream, or body of water, and that any grant, subletting, sale, transfer, or assignment in violation hereof shall be null and void.

(h) That any and all vessels owned or chartered by the United States Government shall in case of any emergency, or in time of war, have prior right, free of charge, to the use of any such structure; and (i) Shall contain such further restrictions as the Secretary of War may see fit to impose therein.

SEC. 4. That no such authorization by the Secretary of War shall be granted to any person unless the applicant therefor shall first furnish to the Secretary of War satisfactory proof either that he (or it) is the owner or lessee of the approaches to the shore end of the proposed structure, with the right to use the same in connection therewith, or that he (or it) is the owner of a franchise granting the right to use said approaches in connection with such proposed structure. Every application to the Secretary of War for any such authorization shall be accompanied by plans and specifications for such structure, extension, or improvement, which said plans and specifications shall be submitted to, and approved by, the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army before the granting of any such authorization by the Secretary of War, "and such plans and specifications shall not be deviated from in any such structure, extension, or improvement without the written consent, first obtained, of the said Chief of Engineers."

SEC. 5. That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to effect legal or equitable rights, if any, existing at the date of the approval of this act which were acquired by the government of Porto Rico or any other party under any contract, lease, or license, for the construction, extension, improvement, or maintenance of any such structure, granted by the United States authorities prior to the approval of this act.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to suspend the rules and pass the bill in the nature of a substitute as amended.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS IN POST-OFFICES.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 2140) to authorize the Postmaster-General to dispose of useless papers in post-offices, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to sell as waste paper or otherwise dispose of the files of papers which have accumulated or may hereafter accumulate in post-offices that are not needed in the transaction of current business and have no permanent value or historical interest, and pay the proceeds of said sales into the Treasury as postal revenues.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

No second being demanded, the question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

REGULATING PRACTICE IN CERTAIN CASES IN WESTERN DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. FLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 18328) to regulate the practice in certain civil and criminal cases in the western district of Arkansas, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in civil cases in law or equity, now or hereafter pending, in either the district or circuit court of the United States, for either of the divisions of the western district of Arkansas, may, on written stipulation of the parties or their attorneys of record, signed and filed with the papers in the case, in vacation or in term, and on the written order of the judge, signed and filed in the case, in vacation, or on the order of the court, duly entered of record, in term, be transferred to another division of the district for final trial; and in the event of such transfer, it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court in which such suit is pending to make out and transfer a certified copy of all the record entries in the case together with all the original papers in the case to the clerk of the court to which such case is transferred, for which he shall have such fees as are now allowed for making transcripts, and the sum of $2 additional for transferring the same, to be taxed as costs and paid as other costs in the case, and the clerk receiving such transcript and original papers shall file the same and the case shall then proceed to final disposition as other cases of like nature.

SEC. 2. That the defendants in criminal cases now or hereafter pending in the district courts of the Harrison or Texarkana divisions of the western district of Arkansas and who are incarcerated at Fort Smith to await trial because of their inability to furnish bail and who desire to plead "guilty" may, on their written motion showing those facts and filed in the case, in vacation, and upon the order of the judge, duly signed and filed in the case, have their cases transferred to the Fort Smith division of the western district of Arkansas, to the end that trials may be had and sentences imposed as in other cases of like nature; and prisoners bound over to answer to indictments in the Harrison or Texarkana divisions of the western district of Arkansas for offenses committed in those divisions and who are incarcerated in the jail at Fort Smith, Ark., for inability to furnish bail, and who desire to plead "guilty" to such offenses, may on their own motions have their cases submitted to a grand jury of the Fort Smith division for indictment and final disposition in the courts of that division, or in proper cases may plead to informations filed in the proper court in said division and have their cases disposed of as other cases of like nature when the offense was committed in the Fort Smith division. When a transfer is ordered, as provided in this section, the clerk shall make out and forthwith send a certified copy of the record entries, together with the indictment and all the original papers, to the clerk of the court to which such case is transferred, who shall file the same, and thereupon the case shall be proceeded with as other cases of like nature pending in such court. For making out said transcript and forwarding the same, together with the original papers in said case, the clerk of the court shall have the usual compensation for making out transcripts, as now provided by law, and $2 additional, to be taxed and paid as other costs in like cases.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of having the bill explained I will demand a second.

Mr. FLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I simply want an explanation of the bill. It would seem to provide on its face for changing the methods of court procedure in the western district of Arkansas. I would like to know to what extent it makes changes. Of course it would not do to have one kind of civil procedure in one district and another kind in another district, and if it makes a change of a general character, in my judgment it ought not to pass.

Mr. FLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I will take pleasure in explaining this bill to the gentleman from Indiana. In the western district of Arkansas there are three courts. One is situated at Texarkana, one at Harrison, and one at Fort Smith. The jail for the entire district is at Fort Smith. This bill provides that persons who are incarcerated in jail in default of bail at Fort Smith on criminal charges may be permitted on their own application, in case they desire to plead guilty, to have their cases tried before the Fort Smith division of the court and enter pleas of guilty. That only occurs on the application of the defendant in a case in which he has been incarcerated in default of bond. The object of this provision is to enable parties who desire to plead guilty to dispose of their cases more rapidly, so that they will not be required to be confined in jail until the meeting of the court at Texarkana or at Harrison.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It provides only for a more convenient arrangement for the disposition of cases in that particular district?

Mr. FLOYD. That is all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It has no reference to proceedings in the courts?

Mr. FLOYD. It has no reference to proceedings in other courts except in the western district of Arkansas.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It does not change the procedure in the court, does it?

Mr. FLOYD. In no way, except that the defendant incarcerated in jail on his own application in a criminal case may have his case disposed of at Fort Smith when he desires to plead guilty.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Fort Smith is in the same district?

Mr. FLOYD. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And so, as I said a moment ago, its purpose is to provide a more convenient arrangement for the trial of cases at the several points in that district.

Mr. FLOYD. That is all, in reference to criminal cases. Now, there is another provision of the bill, with reference to civil cases, which I desire to explain. This bill further provides that parties to civil suits in any of the divisions of the western district of Arkansas may change the case from one division of the district to another by written stipulation of the attorneys, so that the case may be transferred from one division to the other by consent of the parties for trial in civil cases.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is that from one district to another or from one division to another?

Mr. FLOYD. From one division to another.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Can not that be done now under the law?

Mr. FLOYD. No; it can not. I will state further that this bill comes from the Committee on the Judiciary and has the unanimous report of that committee. I desire also to state that Judge Rogers, who presides over the courts in that district, has given his sanction to the bill and in fact suggested it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

FORT SHAW MILITARY RESERVATION, MONT.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 17114) to provide for the disposition under the public land laws of the lands in the abandoned Fort Shaw Military Reservation, Mont.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to dispose of the lands in the abandoned Fort Shaw Military Reservation, in Montana, under the provisions of the public land laws, and the public land surveys shall be extended over the lands therein: Provided, That he may reserve for Indian school purposes the following described lands in township 20 north, range 2 west, Montana principal meridian, as determined by the extension of public surveys: That portion of section 2 lying south of Sun River, all of sections 11, 14, and 23, and that portion of section 26 lying within the present reservation boundary: Provided further, That before opening the reservation to entry, the Secretary of the Interior may withdraw any other lands therein needed in connection with an irrigation project under the provisions of the act of June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, for use or disposition thereunder.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

A second not being demanded, the question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

SUBDIVISION OF LANDS ENTERED UNDER THE RECLAMATION ACT.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 18536) providing for the subdivision of lands entered under the reclamation act, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, a lesser area than 40 acres may be reasonably required for the support of a family on lands to be irrigated under the provisions of the act of June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, he may fix a lesser area than 40 acres as the minimum entry and may establish farm units of not less than 10 nor more than 160 acres. That wherever it may be necessary, for the purpose of accurate description, to further subdivide lands to be irrigated under the provisions of said reclamation act, the Secretary of the Interior may cause subdivision surveys to be made by the officers of the reclamation service, which subdivisions shall be rectangular in form, except in cases where irregular subdivisions may be necessary in order to provide for practicable and economical irrigation. Such subdivision surveys shall be noted upon the tract books in the General Land Office, and they shall be paid for from the reclamation fund.

SEC. 2. That wherever the Secretary of the Interior, in carrying out the provisions of the reclamation act, shall acquire lands covered by a bona fide unperfected entry under the land laws of the United States, the entryman upon such tract may make another and additional entry, as though the entry thus relinquished had not been made.

SEC. 3. That any town site hertofore set apart or established by proclamation of the President, under the provisions of sections 2380 and 2381 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, within or in the vicinity of any reclamation project, may be appraised and disposed of in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved April 16, 1906, entitled "An act providing for the withdrawal from public entry of lands needed for town-site purposes in connection with irrigation projects under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, and for other purposes;" and all necessary expenses incurred in the appraisal and sale of lands embraced within any such town site shall be paid from the reclamation fund, and the proceeds of the sales of such lands shall be covered into the reclamation fund.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. REEDER. I move that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Before I give unanimous consent, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas——

The SPEAKER. This is for the ordering of a second.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know, but before that is done I would like to ask if this has been considered by the Committee on Irrigation and is it a unanimous report?

Mr. REEDER. Yes, sir; and it is a unanimous report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from Kansas is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Iowa is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Speaker, this bill has three purposes in view.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, perhaps it will shorten my friend's remarks. In the hasty reading of the bill it occurred to me that a few weeks ago we passed a bill covering precisely the same point as to sale of lands inside of town sites in these irrigation projects, and that a bill has already been passed covering that question. I would like to ask my friend if he has taken pains to compare the bill passed by the House a short while ago with that feature of the bill?

Mr. REEDER. It was thought that we had passed a bill that did cover this point, but the Department has held that that bill does not cover certain town sites that had been set apart previous to the passage of that bill, and this bill simply brings those three town sites under the provisions of the bill which we passed within a short time.

Mr. LACEY. What is the status of the bill we passed? Has it gone through the Senate and become a law?

Mr. REEDER. Yes, sir; it has become a law.

Mr. LACEY. And this proposes to make further amendment?

Mr. REEDER. This is simply to bring three town sites under the provisions of that law, which all thought at that time were under its provisions.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman to read that part that enlarges the bill which we passed.

Mr. REEDER (reading):

SEC. 3. That any town site heretofore set apart or established by proclamation of the President, under the provisions of sections 2380 and 2381 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, within or in the vicinity of any reclamation project, may be appraised and disposed of in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved April 16, 1906, entitled "An act providing for the withdrawal from public entry of lands needed for town-site purposes in connection with irrigation projects under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, and for other purposes;" and all necessary expenses incurred in the appraisal and sale of lands embraced within any such town site shall be paid from the reclamation fund, and the proceeds of the sales of such lands shall be covered into the reclamation fund.

It makes exactly the same provision made in the bill passed within the last fifteen days, except it applies to some town sites heretofore set apart, and it was supposed at that time that these town sites were covered by the law passed less than fifteen days from the present time, but the Department has held that that law does not cover these three town sites.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would only like to add a word or two to what the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REEDER] has said. Some confusion arises owing to introducing a bill providing for matters of reclamation and coupling with that bill further provisions as to the disposition of public lands. The bill to which the gentleman referred was reported, I think, by the Committee on Public Lands at the request of the Department, in order to cover the very matters that seem to be embraced in part now in the present bill.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LACEY (continuing). By bringing in that feature of the bill over which the Committee on Irrigation has no jurisdiction, and coupling that with the proviso as to the disposition of the proceeds, it leads to confusion and this duplication of legislation.

Mr. REEDER. Let me say——

Mr. LACEY. I presume either committee would have jurisdiction of this bill, but it has been so drawn as to provide for matters that are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Public Lands Committee and other matters that are exclusively in the jurisdiction of the Irrigation Committee.

Mr. REEDER. I will say this particular part of the bill was drawn by the department, and they requested that our committee insert it in this bill, which also covers two other points.

Mr. LACEY. What department?

Mr. REEDER. The Irrigation Department.

Mr. LACEY. That is the trouble; the Irrigation Department is attempting to make regulations as to the disposal of the public lands. They have no right to dispose of them. All they have to do is to receive the proceeds of public lands and spend them in irrigation. The lands themselves must be disposed of by the Land Office and not by the Irrigation Bureau, which is an entirely separate organization. I do not care to complain of this, but the two committees have been trying to get along harmoniously, and there has been no effort on the part of the Committee on Public Lands at any time to neglect preparing the necessary provisions as to the disposal of the domain that is inside of an irrigation scheme; but this confusion makes endless trouble, where two committees are attempting to legislate on the same subject on separate lines and without consultation. Here comes a bill to amend that law within two weeks of the time that the bill has been passed at the request of the Irrigation Bureau, and from the Irrigation Committee, one that has nothing to do with the sale of public lands.

Mr. REEDER. Let me say to the gentleman from Iowa that he stated to start with that he thought they had provided that these town sites should come within the former bill. The Department then decided that the law did not cover the three towns established previous to the passage of this town-site law, and in order to cover these towns the Irrigation Department suggested we put a provision in this bill which will accomplish what all thought was accomplished by the former bill when it was passed.

Mr. LACEY. I can not see yet, Mr. Speaker, where there is any defect in the former law.

Mr. REEDER. These town sites were laid out——

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I think I understand this. The proceeds from the town sites were not specifically provided for as to going into the irrigation fund.

Mr. REEDER. Except as to the three town sites that had been previously laid out on the Minidoka project in Idaho, it did fully provide. All thought that these particular town sites came under the law the same as any other town sites. The Department held that they did not, and in order to provide for that defect this provision was suggested by the Department.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REEDER] yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. REEDER. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. As I understand your bill, it provides that these irrigable lands shall be sold in quantities of not less than 10 acres and up to as high as 160 acres?

Mr. REEDER. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Now, is it contemplated to sell the public domain in that way?

Mr. REEDER. It is contemplated under these irrigation projects. Where they find that a man can not cultivate 40 acres, but can cultivate and care for 10 acres, the Department has the privilege of reducing the farming unit to 10 acres; and hence a man can take 10 acres of this land to pay for the water necessary to irrigate it and not be obliged to take 40 acres. Where it has been found impracticable for them to utilize and pay for so large a tract, in such cases they desire the privilege of making the farm unit less. And I will say, from my experiences in looking over those irrigation projects last year, I favored making the unit as low as 5 acres, but the committee thought that 10 acres would be low enough.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the bill provide that a man should be an actual settler upon the land, subject to the homestead laws of the United States, to be entitled to a 10-acre subdivision?

Mr. REEDER. Yes, sir. On land that may be improved in certain sections by irrigation. For instance, in your country there are places where they can plant fruits, and 10 acres is as much as one man can handle profitably.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Suppose he has 160 acres under the laws now and has lived on it; he may have located upon the land. Can he drop 80 or 100 acres?

Mr. REEDER. He can if he so desires.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. He can not be forced to drop any part of it unless he chooses.

Mr. REEDER. No, sir; but of the public lands he can take under the law only so much as the irrigation department determines, between 10 and 160 acres.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have not had an opportunity to examine the bill, but I think it is a bill in the right direction.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas still further, if he has a communication from the Department relative to this matter?

Mr. REEDER. I think I have right here the exact paper sent us by the Department, suggesting that portion of the bill.

Mr. LACEY. By whom was the bill drawn?

Mr. REEDER. I do not know that I can answer that.

Mr. LACEY. From what Department did it come?

Mr. REEDER. It was from the Geological Survey; the irrigation department.

Mr. LACEY. It did not come from the Land Department?

Mr. REEDER. I am not quite sure; but I do not think it did.

Mr. LACEY. I would ask, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman does not think he ought to withdraw the bill and consult with the officials of the Land Office about this matter he proposes to have done by the House? It is a matter that comes from the Geological Survey, and relates to patents on lands and the disposition of lands, two entirely different organizations charged with the operation of the bill. This comes from the Geological Survey.

Mr. REEDER. I think that would be very undesirable. I do not think I would be willing to do that, for the reason that it simply provides that the three towns that all supposed came under the law passed a couple of weeks since shall come under the law. The Department holds these particular towns do not come under it.

Mr. LACEY. That is the point I am making; that this is from the Geological Survey, that has no law department connected with it.

Mr. REEDER. It was the Land Department.

Mr. LACEY. Then, the gentleman can not tell me whether the proposed bill which he now presents was drawn by the Geological Survey or in the Land Department.

Mr. REEDER. I think it was drawn at the Geological Survey. But I see the gentleman from Wyoming, the chairman of the committee, is here now, and I will permit him to answer.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that the officers of the Reclamation Service took up with the officers of the General Land Office the question as to whether the three town sites heretofore established in the State of Idaho could be appraised and sold under the law passed a few days ago. It was the opinion of the officers of the Land Office that there was some question as to whether this could be done.

Mr. LACEY. Now, what communication has my friend on that subject from the Land Office?

Mr. MONDELL. I have no communication from the Land Office on that subject, but, Mr. Speaker, the officials of the Land Office also informed the gentlemen on the Reclamation Service that they had no funds with which they could proceed to appraise and sell these town sites in Idaho under the law under which they were set apart. So that it is necessary either to provide an appropriation for the appraisal and sale of these town sites under the law under which they were originally set apart or to provide, which we believe is better, that these town sites shall now come under the provisions of the law passed a few days ago. This bill provides that these town sites may be appraised and sold under the general law which was reported from the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, and which became a law April 16.

Mr. REEDER. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. LACEY. It is a rather novel proposition that the Land Department should call upon this House through this committee for legislation on the bill which passed on the 16th of April, or was approved on the 16th of April, and affecting a matter that is entirely different.

This new law is from a Department that is in no way in charge of the land laws in any sense, and it should have gone to another committee, and say when a bill that had been presented by the Interior Department through its law officers, and which was just a couple of weeks old, required a new enactment or remodeling into some other form. Of course it would have to go to the Committee on Public Lands. It would come up as a separate proposition, but being combined as it was with the irrigation question, it might go to either, and the result is we have two committees, each one of them possibly coming to different conclusions, and the House being asked under a suspension of the rules, without opportunity for examination, to pass this feature of the bill.

Now, my friend from Wyoming is on both committees, and no doubt more familiar with the details than the gentleman in charge of the bill. I do not want to obstruct the bill, but it is a very unsatisfactory form in which to present legislation in the House.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think it is extraordinary, Mr. Speaker, and I hope not unsatisfactory. The Committee on Irrigation reported a bill some little time ago providing for town sites on irrigation tracts. That bill became a law April 16. Prior to the passage of that legislation there had been three town sites set aside in the State of Idaho under one of our town-site laws, under which the proceeds of sales go to the National Treasury. We supposed that these town sites already established could be appraised and sold under the new law.

Now, it seems there is some question whether this can be done, but this would not be so important except for the fact that the Land Office has no funds with which to appraise and sell those town sites in accordance with the law under which they were set aside. Therefore unless we make some such provision as is contained in this bill, those town sites can not be appraised and sold, and the people can not obtain titles to their lots. There has been no attempt on the part of the Committee on Irrigation to usurp the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Public Lands. The question of town sites under irrigation projects is one that the Committee on Irrigation has had charge of from the beginning, if the gentleman from Iowa will recall; but owing to the fact that there are three town sites already set aside under an old law, which can not be sold because there is no appropriation available, we find it necessary to provide by this legislation that they may be sold and disposed of under the legislation which became a law April 16.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor of the motion——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Speaker!

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 96, noes 5.

Accordingly (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill passed.

FORT KEOGH MILITARY RESERVATION, MONT.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 5203) granting to the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, of Montana, a right of way through the Fort Keogh Military Reservation in Montana, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves to suspend the rules and pass a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, of Montana, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Montana, be, and the same is hereby, empowered to survey, locate, construct, and maintain a railway, telegraph, and telephone line through Fort Keogh Military Reservation, Mont., upon such a line as may be determined and approved by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That said corporation is authorized to take and use for all purposes of a railway, telegraph, and telephone line, and for no other purpose, a right of way 100 feet in width through said Fort Keogh Military Reservation, and a right to take and use a strip of land in said reservation 200 feet in width, with a length of 3,000 feet, in addition to said right of way, for stations, station grounds, and stock yards, with the right to use other additional ground, when cuts and fills may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of said roadbed, not exceeding 100 feet in width on each side of said right of way, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no part of the lands herein authorized to be taken shall be used except in such manner and for such purposes as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railway, telegraph, and telephone lines and the use and enjoyment of the rights and privileges herein granted; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used such portion shall revert to the United States, from which the same shall be taken: Provided further, That the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, of Montana, will fence its right of way and will provide and maintain necessary and suitable crossings: And provided further, That the said Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, of Montana, shall comply with such other regulations or conditions as may from time to time be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

No second was demanded; and the question being taken

(two-thirds voting in favor thereof), the rules were suspended and the bill passed.

MARYLAND OYSTER BEDS.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 18435) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to cooperate, through the Bureau of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries, with the shellfish commissioners of the State of Maryland in making surveys of the natural oyster beds, bars, and rocks in the waters within the State of Maryland.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, upon the request of the governor of the State of Maryland, to designate such officers, experts, and employees of the Bureau of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and of the Bureau of Fisheries as may be necessary to cooperate with the Maryland State board of shellfish commissioners in making a survey of and locating the natural oyster beds, bars, and rocks in the waters within the State of Maryland; and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby authorized and directed to furnish to the officers, experts, and employees of said Bureaus so detailed as aforesaid such instruments, appliances, and steam launches as may be necessary to make the survey aforesaid; and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby authorized to have made in the Bureau of the Coast and Geodetic Survey all the plats necessary to show the results of the aforesaid survey and the locations of the said natural oyster beds, bars, and rocks in the waters within the State of Maryland, and to furnish to the board of shellfish commissioners of the State of Maryland such copies as may be necessary, and for this purpose to employ, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, such technically qualified persons as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby further authorized to have erected or constructed by the officers so detailed as aforesaid, while making said survey, such structures as may be necessary to mark the points of triangulation, so that the same may be used for such future work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey as the said Bureau may be hereafter required to perform in prosecuting the Government coast survey of the navigable waters of the United States located within the State of Maryland.

SEC. 3. That the Bureau of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to expend, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, a sum of money not exceeding $15,000 in carrying out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect from the date of its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

No second being demanded, the question was taken; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill passed.

DAM ACROSS NIOBRARA RIVER, NEBRASKA.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 17982) to grant to Charles H. Cornell, his assigns and successors, the right to abut a dam across the Niobrara River on the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, Nebr., and to construct and operate a trolley or electric railway line and telegraph and telephone line across said reservation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Charles H. Cornell, his assigns, assignees, successors, and grantees, be, and are hereby, privileged, authorized, and granted the authority and right to construct, maintain, and use for power purposes a dam across the Niobrara River on parts of sections 22 and 27, township 34, range 27 west of the sixth principal meridian, in the State of Nebraska, and to abut said dam on the east bank of said Niobrara River upon land which is a part of the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, the property of the United States; and said dam may be of sufficient height and strength to support a body of water affording or furnishing as much as fifty feet effective head for power purposes, with the privilege of backing water upon or overflowing such part of the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation as may reasonably result from the proper construction, maintenance, and use of said dam, and that any damages caused thereby may be assessed by the Secretary of War and paid to the United States before any construction hereby provided for shall be commenced, with the privilege also of constructing and suspending wires upon, over, and across said military reservation for the purpose of transmitting electric light and power generated by said water power, also with like privileges of constructing and suspending telephone wires: Provided, That the grants and privileges above specified as to such dam, water power, and wires aforesaid shall become void unless the construction of said dam be commenced within two years from the approval of this act and completed and put into operation within five years from the approval of this act; and the said Charles H. Cornell, his assigns, assignees, successors, and grantees, are further privileged, authorized, and granted the authority and right to construct and operate a trolley or electric railway, with necessary side tracks and station buildings, also telegraph and telephone lines, upon, over, and across the land of said Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, said trolley or electric railway and telegraph and telephone lines to start from the town of Valentine and run by a feasible route as nearly as may be in a direct course to the Fort Niobrara military post, upon said military reservation, thence north or northeast upon a feasible route in the direction of the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, with authority to operate and use such trolley or electric railway and telegraph and telephone lines: Provided, That a map of said proposed dam, storage reservoir, railway line, telegraph line, or telephone line shall be filed with the honorable Secretary of War, and the location thereof shall by him be approved before any of these privileges herein aforesaid shall become effective: Provided further, That the privileges herein granted may at any time be rescinded or suspended by order of the Secretary of War; and said corporation shall, at any time when so ordered by the Secretary of War, remove its rails and all fixtures and appurtenances, at its own expense and cost and without any claim of any kind from the United States: And provided further, That the grants and privileges mentioned in this act as to said railway, telegraph, and telephone right of way shall become void unless the road or railway shall be commenced within two years from the date of the approval of this act and said road and telegraph or telephone line be completed from the town of Valentine to the Fort Niobrara military post, on said Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, and put into operation within five years from the date of the approval of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

No second being demanded, the question was taken; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill passed.

DISTRIBUTION OF ANNUITIES TO CERTAIN INDIANS.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 10133) to provied for the annual pro rata distribution of the annuities of the Sac and Fox Indians of the Mississippi between the two branches of the tribe, and to adjust the existing claims between the two branches as to said annuities, as amended.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the future distribution of the annual appropriations for the fulfillment of existing treaty stipulations with the Sac and Fox Indians of the Mississippi the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed, after deducting the $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the support of the manual-labor school, as provided in article 9 of the treaty of 1867, with said Indians, to make a pro rata division thereof between the two branches of the tribe, one branch residing in the Territory of Oklahoma and the other branch residing in the State of Iowa, according to their respective numbers to be ascertained by the annual enrollment of them.

SEC. 2. That in order to settle and adjust the claims of that branch of the tribe residing in the State of Iowa, as set forth in their memorial to Congress, printed in Senate Document No. 64, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be transferred on the books of the Treasury Department from the fund of $251,929.50 held to the credit of the Sac and Fox Indians of the Mississippi in Oklahoma, or whatever the amount thereof may be at the date of the passage of this act, the sum of $100,167.10, to the credit of that branch of said tribe now residing in the State of Iowa, and from the amount so transferred to pay to R. V. Belt, the attorney of the said Sac and Fox Indians residing in the State of Iowa, the compensation fixed by them in council assembled by resolution adopted November 6, 1899, as set forth on page 26 in House of Representatives Document No. 38, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session; also to pay therefrom to the principal chief of the Foxes of said tribe the sum of $1,000 in settlement of the claim of said principal chief for the annual installments of the amount stipulated by the treaty to be paid to him and not heretofore so paid.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

There was no demand for a second.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the bill was passed.

TURPENTINE TREES ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass with amendment the bill (H. R. 16672) to punish cutting, chipping, or boxing trees on the public lands.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every person who shall cut, chip, chop, or box any tree on any lands belonging to the United States or on any lands covered by or embraced in any unperfected settlement, application, filing, entry, selection, or location, made under any law of the United States, for the purpose of obtaining from such tree any pitch, turpentine, or other substance; and every person who shall knowingly encourage, cause, procure, or aid any such tree to be so cut, or who shall buy, trade for, or in any manner acquire any pitch, turpentine, or other substance, or any article or commodity made from any pitch, turpentine, or other substance, when he has knowledge that the same has been so unlawfully obtained from such trees, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

There was no demand for a second.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

RIGHT OF WAY ACROSS PIGEON POINT LIGHT-HOUSE RESERVATION, SAN MATEO COUNTY, CAL.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 15078) granting to the Ocean Shore Railway Company a right of way for railroad purposes across Pigeon Point Light-House Reservation, in San Mateo County, Cal., as amended, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a right of way be, and the same hereby is, granted to the Ocean Shore Railway Company, a railroad corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, its successors and assigns, over, upon, and across the United States Light-House Reservation at Pigeon Point, in the county of San Mateo, State of California, 40 feet in width, being 20 feet in width on the northerly side and 20 feet in width on the southerly side of a center line described as follows, namely: Beginning at a point on the southeasterly boundary line of a tract known as the "nine-acre lot," which shall be 28 feet, more or less, from the northeasterly corner of said lot; thence westerly 800 feet, more or less, along a circular curve, to the right, whose radius shall be 1,910 feet to a point on the northwesterly boundary of said lot, 125 feet, more or less, northerly from the southwesterly corner; said right of way as thus described containing 0.73 of an acre, more or less: Provided, That the Ocean Shore Railway Company, its successors and assigns, shall place a suitable fence on each side of the said right of way, with proper gates and cattle guards, and shall also place a watering trough with pipe 1 inch in diameter laid 18 inches under the surface, with suitable cocks and fittings, joining said trough with the water tank now at or near the northwest corner of said "nine-acre lot," all to be placed and maintained to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and without expense to the United States; and the officers, employees, and agents of the United States shall have the right of ingress and egress to and from the right of way herein granted, and shall at all times have access to the water pipes laid underground across said right of way: Provided further, That the Ocean Shore Railway Company, its successors and assigns, shall deliver light-house freight shipped over that road and billed to Pigeon Point light-station as near the said "nine-acre lot" as practicable and not in any case to exceed one-fourth of a mile from said "nine-acre lot."

SEC. 2. That Congress expressly reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act, in whole or in part, without liability on the part of the United States for any damages or losses sustained by said company.

SEC. 3. That said right of way shall be used for railroad purposes only, and if at any time it ceases to be so used then and in that event said grant shall be terminated and said property revert to the United States; and the right herein granted shall be forfeited by said company, its successors and assigns, unless the road shall be constructed through the said reservation within three years after the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to demand a second, I would like to ask a question. Does this bill have the approval of the Light-House Board?

Mr. HAYES. Yes; and the unanimous report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

No second being demanded, the question was taken; and, two-thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

LEASES IN YELLOWSTONE PARK.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 14410) to amend an act approved August 3, 1894, entitled "An act concerning leases in the Yellowstone National Park," with an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to lease for a period not exceeding ten years, at an annual rental to be determined by him, to any person, corporation, or company he may authorize to transact business in the Yellowstone Park separate tracts of land, not exceeding 20 acres each, at such places, not to exceed ten in number to any one person, corporation, or company, in said park as the comfort and convenience of visitors may require, for the construction and maintenance of substantial hotel buildings and buildings for the protection of stage, stock, and equipment.

Any person, corporation, or company holding a lease within said park for the purposes above described is hereby authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to execute mortgages upon his or its rights, properties, and franchises, including his or its contract or contracts with the Secretary of the Interior, and such mortgages, together with the approval of said Secretary of the Interior, may be filed for record in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and when so recorded shall have all the effect of a public record.

Any mortgage, lien, or incumbrance created under the provisions hereof shall be subject to the rights of the Government to compel the enforcement of the terms of the lease or contract of the mortgagor, and any purchaser under a foreclosure of such incumbrance shall take subject to all conditions assumed by the original lessee or contractor.

All provisions of existing law in relation to said park not in conflict herewith are hereby continued in full force and effect.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to demand a second, I would like to ask a question. That grants permission only for the purpose of convenience of travelers?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. It is a bill prepared by the Secretary——

Mr. PERKINS. It is not for any business purposes.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Oh, no; it is for the hotels.

Mr. PALMER. Of course it is for a business purpose.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, for the convenience of travelers.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

No second being demanded, the question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill as amended was passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 18376), to authorize the Minnesota, Dakota and Pacific Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Missouri River, which I send to the desk and ask to have read, as amended.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, before that bill is read I would like to ask the gentleman if he is moving to pass the Senate bill or the House bill?

Mr. MARSHALL. The House bill is the one that the gentleman from South Dakota gave me.

Mr. LACEY. That bill has already passed the Senate, and I would suggest to the gentleman that he move to pass the Senate bill in lieu of the House bill.

Mr. MARSHALL. In that event I will ask to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Are the bills identical?

Mr. LACEY. Yes; they were introduced about the same time in each House, and the Senate bill has come over, having passed the Senate.

Mr. MONDELL. This bill is amended.

Mr. LACEY. The Senate bill passed with the amendment, I think, that is proposed in this bill.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I will ask to substitute the Senate bill, being S. 5943, for the bill which I just sent to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota moves to suspend the rules and pass the following Senate bill, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Minnesota, Dakota and Pacific Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of South Dakota, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a railway bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River between the mouth of the Moreau River and the south line of Walworth County, in the State of South Dakota, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906: Provided, That said corporation shall commence said construction within two years and complete the same within four years from the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

No second being demanded, the question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a similar House bill will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

JOHN W. HAMMOND.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the following concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be requested to return the bill (H. R. 8948) entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to John W. Hammond."

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I make this motion in view of the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., May 5, 1906.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: There has been referred to this office from the President H. R. 8948, entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to John W. Hammond."

The records of this office show that the said pensioner died on April 7, 1906; consequently the act, if approved, would be inoperative.

Inclosed please find a draft of a concurrent resolution requesting the President to return the bill to the House of Representatives.

Very respectfully,

V. WARNER, Commissioner.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

A second not being demanded, the question was taken; and two-thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the concurrent resolution was passed.

FORT DOUGLAS MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 5498) granting additional land from the Fort Douglas Military Reservation to the University of Utah.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to the University of Utah the following-described land lying within the Fort Douglas Military Reservation and adjacent to the site of said university, in the State of Utah, namely: Beginning at the point of intersection of the west boundary line of Fort Douglas Reservation and north boundary line of Fourth South street, of Salt Lake City, which point is 10.23 rods east and 192.14 rods south of the northeast corner of section 5, township 1 south, range 1 east, Salt Lake meridian, and which marks the southwest corner of the present campus of the University of Utah, and running thence south 48 rods, thence east 80 rods, thence north 184 rods to the intersection of the prolongation of the north boundary of the campus of the University of Utah, thence west 9.4 rods to the northeast corner of the university campus, thence south 136 rods along the east boundary of the campus to the southeast corner of same, thence west 70.6 rods to point of beginning: Provided, That the State of Utah shall improve the said property and maintain the same for university purposes and not otherwise, and that in case said land shall be abandoned by the State for said purposes the said land and all improvements thereon shall revert to the United States: Provided further, That the grant of said land shall in no manner carry with it any right or title in or to any portion of the waters of the Red Butte Canyon Creek: And provided further, That there is reserved to the United States the perpetual right to maintain, alter, rebuild, and enlarge the sewer which runs from the Fort Douglas Military Post across said tract of land, or to construct and maintain a new sewer system across the same should it be desirable so to do.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

A second not being demanded, the question was taken; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN ENTRYMEN AND SETTLERS WITHIN THE LIMITS OF THE NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY LAND GRANT.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 2292) for the relief of certain entrymen and settlers within the limits of the Northern Pacific Railway land grant.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of July 1, 1898 (30 Stat., pp. 597 and 620), which provided for the adjustment by the Land Department of conflicting claims to lands within the limits of the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and also the provisions of the act of March 2, 1901, entitled "An act for the relief of settlers under the public land laws to lands within the indemnity limits of the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company," be, and they hereby are, extended to include any bona fide settlement or entry made subsequent to January 1, 1898, and prior to May 31, 1905, in accordance with the erroneous decision of the Land Department respecting the withdrawal on general route of the Northern Pacific Railroad between Wallula, Wash., and Portland, Oreg., where the same has not since been abandoned: Provided, That all lieu selections made under this act shall be confined to lands within the State where the private holdings are situated.

SEC. 2. That this act shall become effective upon an acceptance thereof by the Northern Pacific Railway Company being filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

A second not being demanded, the question was taken; and two-thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

GREAT COASTING DISTRICTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 5572) to amend section 4348 of the Revised Statutes, establishing great coasting districts of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4348 of the Revised Statutes be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4348. The seacoasts and navigable rivers of the United States and Porto Rico shall be divided into five great districts: The first to include all the collection districts on the seacoasts and navigable rivers between the northern boundary of the State of Maine and the southern boundary of the State of Texas; the second to consist of the island of Porto Rico; the third to include the collection districts on the seacoasts and navigable rivers between the southern boundary of the State of California and the northern boundary of the State of Washington; the fourth to consist of the Territory of Alaska; the fifth to consist of the Territory of Hawaii."

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect on and after January 1, 1907.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to demand a second—I do not know whether I shall or not—does the gentleman think there are any more people here now than there were this morning?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think about the same number.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You think the Speaker would probably arrive at the conclusion there were 208?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I will not demand a second. [Laughter and applause.]

A second not being demanded, the question was taken; and two-thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

REGULATION OF MOTOR BOATS.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 4094) to amend section 4426 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; regulation of motor boats.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4426 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and it is hereby, amended by striking out, after the words "launches of ten," and before the words "and under," the words "tons burden," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "gross tons," and by striking out, after the words "above fifteen," and before the words "carrying freight," the words "tons burden," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "gross tons;" and also that said section be, and it is hereby, further amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "All vessels of 15 gross tons or less propelled in whole or in part by gas, gasoline, petroleum, naphtha, fluid, or electricity, and carrying passengers for hire, shall carry one life-preserver, of the sort prescribed by the regulations of the board of supervising inspectors, for every passenger carried, and no such boat while so carrying passengers shall be operated or navigated except in charge of a person duly licensed for such service by the local board of inspectors. No examination shall be required as a condition of the obtaining of such a license, and any such license shall be revoked or suspended by the local board of inspectors for misconduct, gross negligence, recklessness in navigation, intemperance, or violation of law on the part of the holder, and if revoked, the person holding such license shall be incapable of obtaining another such license for one year from the date of revocation," so that said section, when amended, shall read as follows:

"SEC. 4426. The hull and boilers of every ferryboat, canal boat, yacht, or other small craft of like character propelled by steam shall be inspected under the provisions of this title. Such other provisions of law for the better security of life as may be applicable to such vessels shall, by the regulations of the board of supervising inspectors, also be required to be complied with before a certificate of inspection shall be granted, and no such vessel shall be navigated without a licensed engineer and a licensed pilot: Provided, however, That in open steam launches of 10 gross tons and under one person, if duly qualified, may serve in the double capacity of pilot and engineer. All vessels of above 15 gross tons carrying freight or passengers for hire, but not engaged in fishing as a regular business, propelled by gas, fluid, naphtha, or electric motors, shall be, and are hereby, made subject to all the provisions of section 4426 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the inspection of hulls and boilers and requiring engineers and pilots, and for any violation of the provisions of this title applicable to such vessels, or of rules or regulations lawfully established thereunder, and to the extent to which such provisions of law and regulations are so applicable, the said vessels, their masters, officers, and owners shall be subject to the provisions of sections 4496, 4497, 4498, 4499, and 4500, relating to the imposition and enforcement of penalties and the enforcement of law.

"All vessels of 15 gross tons or less propelled in whole or in part by gas, gasoline, petroleum, naphtha, fluid, or electricity, and carrying passengers for hire, shall carry one life-preserver, of the sort prescribed by the regulations of the board of supervising inspectors, for every passenger carried, and no such boat while so carrying passengers shall be operated or navigated except in charge of a person duly licensed for such service by the local board of inspectors. No examination shall be required as a condition of the obtaining of such a license, and any such license shall be revoked or suspended by the local board of inspectors for misconduct, gross negligence, recklessness in navigation, intemperance, or violation of law on the part of the holder, and if revoked the person holding such license shall be incapable of obtaining another such license for one year from the date of revocation."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman if he will not briefly explain the changes the bill makes in the present law?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The bill makes no change in the present law excepting that it provides that these small craft shall have an experienced officer. He shall take a license, but without competitive examination or any other examination, and register his name with the license upon application; thereupon, in case of misdemeanor or drunkenness or anything of that character, his name is known to the proper officials of the Government and he can be suspended.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does it require the owners of these boats under 15 tons gross burden that do not carry passengers to take out licenses?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It only changes the law in the particular I have stated. The bill is recommended by the Department of Commerce and Labor and it is unanimously reported from the committee and passed in the Senate in the same way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There has been a great deal of discussion about——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I know; but it does not affect the interest the gentleman is speaking about.

Mr. PERKINS. As I understand, if the gentleman will yield, this bill does not in any of its provisions affect boats that do not carry passengers for hire.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

A second not being demanded, the question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS ROANOKE RIVER.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 18204) to authorize the Northampton and Halifax Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Roanoke River at or near Weldon, N. C.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Northampton and Halifax Bridge Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of North Carolina, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a wagon, cart, vehicle, and footway bridge, and approaches thereto, across the Roanoke River at or near the town of Weldon, in the State of North Carolina, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

No second being demanded, the question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

DANGERS TO NAVIGATION.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 5683) to provide for the removal of derelicts and other floating dangers to navigation, with Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, with Senate amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to have constructed, at a cost not to exceed $250,000, a steam vessel specially fitted for and adapted to service at sea in bad weather, for the purpose of blowing up or otherwise destroying or towing into port wrecks, derelicts, and other floating dangers to navigation, said vessel to be operated and maintained by the Revenue-Cutter Service under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

No second being demanded the question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the bill as amended was passed.

CONDEMNATION OF LANDS IN CONNECTION WITH RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 15095) authorizing the condemnation of lands or easements needed in connection with works of river and harbor improvements at the expense of persons, companies, or corporations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio move to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any person, company, or corporation, municipal or private, shall undertake to secure, for the purpose of conveying the same to the United States free of cost, any land or easement therein, needed in connection with a work of river and harbor improvement duly authorized by Congress, and shall be unable for any reason to obtain a valid title thereto, the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, cause proceedings to be instituted in the name of the United States for the acquirement by condemnation of said land or easement, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to institute and conduct such proceedings upon the request of the Secretary of War: Provided, That all the expenses of said proceedings and any award that may be made thereunder shall be paid by the said person, company, or corporation, to secure which payment the Secretary of War may require the said person, company, or corporation to execute a proper bond in such amount as he may deem necessary before said proceedings are commenced.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

No second being demanded, the question was taken; and, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

SUBDIVISION AND SALE OF LANDS, STATE OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 17127) to provide for the subdivision and sale of certain lands in the State of Washington, with amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill as amended, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior may, if in his opinion the public interests so require, cause lots 1, 2, and 3, and the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 4; and lots 2, 3, and 4, and the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter, and all of the northeast quarter of section 5; and the east half of the northeast quarter and the east half of the southeast quarter of section 7; and the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter, and the south half of the southwest quarter of section 8, in township 21 north; and lot 4 of section 33, in township 22 north, all in range 2 east of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Washington, or any part thereof, to be regularly surveyed or subdivided into tracts or lots of 10 acres each, or less, and into town lots, or either, or both. He shall cause said lands to be so surveyed and subdivided and each tract thereof to be appraised by three competent disinterested men, to be appointed by him, and who shall, after having each been first duly sworn to impartially and faithfully execute the trust reposed in him, appraise said lands, subdivisions, and tracts, and each of them, and report their proceedings to the Secretary of the Interior for his action thereon. If such appraisement be disapproved, the Secretary of the Interior shall again cause the said lands to be appraised as before provided; and when the appraisement has been approved he shall cause the said lands, subdivisions, and lots to be sold at public sale to the highest bidder for cash, at not less than the appraised value thereof and not less than $2.50 per acre, first having given not less than sixty days' public notice of the time, place, and terms of sale, immediately prior to such sale, by publication in at least two newspapers having general circulation in the county or the section of the county where the lands to be sold are situated; and any lands, subdivisions, or lots remaining unsold may be reoffered for sale at any subsequent time in the same manner, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior; and if unsold at such second offering for want of bidders then the Secretary of the Interior may sell the same at private sale for cash at not less than the appraised value nor less than $2.50 per acre: Provided, That any settler who is in actual occupation of any portion of such lands at the date of the passage of this act who has settled thereon in good faith for the purpose of securing a home, and is by law entitled to make a homestead entry, shall be entitled to enter the land so occupied, not exceeding 160 acres in a body, according to the Government surveys and subdivisions thereof, upon payment to the Government of the sum of $2.50 per acre for each acre entered by him, and upon showing residence and cultivation of such lands in the manner and for the length of time required by the homestead laws of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of finding out something about the bill, I demand a second.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. My purpose in demanding a second is to find out how much land this bill covers, and the purpose of the bill.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, the scope of the bill covers about 800 acres of land. In the years of 1866 and 1868 certain lands near Gig Harbor, in Pierce County, in the State of Washington, were placed in two military reserves. In the year 1904 certain of those lands were excluded from the military reserves and placed under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior for disposal under the act of July 5, 1884. Under the provisions of the act of July 5, 1884, it was necessary for settlers, in order to make entry upon the lands thus excluded, to have resided upon these lands since the 1st day of January, 1884. In other words, in order to enter these lands and acquire title thereto they must have resided thereon since twenty-two years ago. Now, there are about eighty settlers on those 800 acres, making about 10 acres for each settler, and this bill simply provides each settler may enter the land upon which he now resides. None of the settlers has lived on these lands as long as twenty-two years. They have lived on it for twenty-one years on down to six and eight years; and this bill waives that necessity created by existing law for residence on these lands for twenty-two years.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Are all these lands now occupied by bona fide settlers?

Mr. CUSHMAN. They are; every acre.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. By the people who proposed to enter them and make homes on them?

Mr. CUSHMAN. And have been so occupied for many years.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have no objection to the bill.

The queston was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 858, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 7065) to amend section 858 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 858 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 858. The competency of a witness to testify in any civil action, suit, or proceeding in the courts of the United States shall be determined by the laws of the State or Territory in which the court is held."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

No second being demanded, the question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

ELECTION OF DELEGATE FROM HAWAII.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 18443) that I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18443) to amend the act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, approved April 30, 1900.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 85 of an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900, shall be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 85. That a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve during each Congress, shall be elected by the voters qualified to vote for members of the house of representatives of the legislature. Such Delegate shall possess the qualifications necessary for membership of the senate of the legislature of Hawaii.

"Such election shall be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November of every even year and at such places as shall be designated by the secretary of the Territory. The ballot for Delegate shall be such as the legislature of Hawaii may designate, and until provision is made by the Territorial legislature the ballot shall be of pink paper and shall be of the same general form as those used for the election of representatives to the legislature.

"The method of certifying the names of candidates for place on this ballot and all the conduct of the election of a Delegate shall be in conformity to the general election laws of the Territory of Hawaii.

"The person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared by the governor duly elected, and a certificate shall be given accordingly.

"Every such Delegate shall have a seat in the House of Representatives, with the right of debate, but not of voting. In case of a vacancy occurring in the office of Delegate, the governor of the Territory is directed to call a special election to fill such vacancy: Provided, however, That no vacancy shall be filled which occurs within five months of the expiration of a Congressional term.

"The legislature of the Territory of Hawaii shall have the right to alter or amend any part of the election laws of said Territory, including those providing for an election of Delegate to Congress, and its action shall be the law, with full, binding force, until altered, amended, or repealed by Congress."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. KEIFER. I would like, without demanding a second, to know in what particular this is an amendment to the present law.

Mr. LLOYD. The Committee on Elections having in charge the election contest from Hawaii made this recommendation:

Your committee respectfully recommend to the House of Representatives that the election laws of the Territory of Hawaii be so amended and supplemented as to provide definitely for the election of a Delegate to the Congress.

Now, the existing organic laws provide for the election of a Delegate, but the existing Territorial law does not provide the method of election, and the purpose of this law is to provide permanently for the election of a Delegate.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not understand from this that it does provide a method of election specially.

Mr. LLOYD. It provides that the Territory of Hawaii shall have authority to prepare the election machinery.

Mr. KEIFER. The present law authorizes that.

Mr. LLOYD. The present law does not.

Mr. KEIFER. It simply provides for the Delegate?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir; it provides for the Delegate, but does not provide for the election.

Mr. KEIFER. Another question. Does this bill, if it becomes law, fix the qualifications for suffrage?

Mr. LLOYD. That is already fixed by existing law.

Mr. KEIFER. That is not changed by this bill?

Mr. LLOYD. It is not changed by this bill.

A second was not demanded.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

CANYON CITY, COLO., PARK.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 4546, with the amendments recommended by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4546) ceding to the city of Canon City, Colo., certain lands for park purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to the city of Canon City, municipal corporation in the county of Fremont and State of Colorado, all lands now belonging to the United States of America located in sections Nos. 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, and 28, in township No. 18 south, range No. 71 west, of the sixth principal meridian, said lands being located along and on either side of the Arkansas River in said State, and containing thereon a certain canyon designated as the Royal Gorge; the said lands to be held by the said city solely for park purposes and for the use and benefit of the public, without other restriction than such as may be necessary to protect the said premises from trespasses and injury. And said lands and all of them are hereby withdrawn from location and entry under the laws of the United States of America.

SEC. 2. That the common council of the said city of Canon City shall have and is hereby granted full power and authority to control, protect, and preserve said lands so removed from entry and ceded, and the water courses and timber thereon; and for the purpose aforesaid to make such rules and regulations preventing trespass, defacement of natural scenery, or any preventable injury to the said canyon as may be necessary or proper in the premises; and the said city council shall further have power and authority to locate and maintain through itself, or grant the right to so locate and maintain to others, railways, wagon roads, ditches, canals, and other improvements, and also to permit on said ceded premises the erection of all such buildings or structures as may be necessary or proper to carry out the purpose and intent of this act.

SEC. 3. That when and so soon as any present appropriations or locations, or any inchoate or incomplete appropriations, or locations of any of the said premises, under any of the land laws of the United States, shall lapse, become forfeited, or abandoned, the premises covered by such locations shall at once, and without further action, fall under and become subject to the operation of this act, and shall be ceded to and become the property of the said city of Canon City for the uses herein set forth.

SEC. 4. That the grant and cession hereby made is to the said city of Canon City alone, and upon any attempt by the said city of Canon City to alienate or encumber the said premises or any portion thereof, or should said city cease to care for said park for a period of three years or more, the title thereto and to all the said lands shall at once revert to and revest in the United States of America; and the said city of Canon City shall further, and within one year from the date hereof, mark and define the boundaries of the said lands by permanent and substantial monuments.

SEC. 5. That the said city of Canon City shall further, and within six months after the marking of said premises, file in the United States land office at Pueblo, Colo., proof of the said marking and determination of the boundaries of said premises as herein above set forth, and the formal acceptance by the said city of the grant herein evidenced, under the conditions herein set forth; and thereupon patent shall issue to the said city of Canon City for the lands above described, subject, however, to the herein stated reservations, limitations, and conditions.

SEC. 6. That the right to amend or repeal this act at any time is hereby reserved, and upon such repeal the title granted herein shall revert to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

A second was not demanded.

The question was taken; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

PROTECTION AND REGULATION OF THE FISHERIES OF ALASKA.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 13543) as amended by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, reported by the committee. The Clerk will read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13543) for the protection and regulation of the fisheries of Alaska.

Be it enacted, etc, That every person, company, or corporation carrying on the business of canning, curing, or preserving fish or manufacturing fish products within the territory known as Alaska, ceded to the United States by Russia by the treaty of March 30, 1867, or in any of the waters of Alaska over which the United States has jurisdiction, shall, in lieu of all other license fees and taxes therefor and thereon, pay license taxes on their said business and output as follows: Canned salmon, 4 cents per case; pickled salmon, 10 cents per barrel; salt salmon in bulk, 5 cents per 100 pounds; fish oil, 10 cents per barrel; fertilizer, 20 cents per ton. The payment and collection of such license taxes shall be under and in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1899, entitled "An act to define and punish crimes in the district of Alaska, and to provide a code of criminal procedure for the district," and amendments thereto.

SEC. 2. That the catch and pack of salmon made in Alaska by the owners of private salmon hatcheries operated in Alaska shall be exempt from all license fees and taxation of every nature at the rate of ten cases of canned salmon to every 1,000 red or king salmon fry liberated, upon the following conditions:

That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may from time to time, and on the application of the hatchery owner shall, within a reasonable time thereafter, cause such private hatcheries to be inspected for the purpose of determining the character of their operations, efficiency, and productiveness, and if he approve the same shall cause notice of such approval to be filed in the office of the clerk or deputy clerk of the United States district court of the division of the district of Alaska wherein any such hatchery is located, and shall also notify the owners of such hatchery of the action taken by him. The owner, agent, officer, or superintendent of any hatchery the effectiveness and productiveness of which has been approved as above provided shall, between the 30th day of June and the 31st day of December of each year, make proof of the number of salmon fry liberated during the twelve months immediately preceding the 30th day of June, by a written statement under oath. Such proof shall be filed in the office of the clerk or deputy clerk of the United States district court of the division of the district of Alaska wherein such hatchery is located, and when so filed shall entitle the respective hatchery owners to the exemption as herein provided; and a false oath as to the number of salmon fry liberated shall be deemed perjury and subject the offender to all the pains and penalties thereof. Duplicates of such statements shall also be filed with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. It shall be the duty of such clerk or deputy clerk in whose office the approval and proof heretofore provided for are filed to forthwith issue to the hatchery owner causing such proofs to be filed, certificates which shall not be transferable and of such denominations as said owner may request (no certificate to cover fewer than 1,000 fry), covering in the aggregate the number of fry so proved to have been liberated; and such certificates may be used at any time by the person, company, corporation, or association to whom issued for the payment pro tanto of any license fees or taxes upon or against or on account of any catch or pack of salmon made by them in Alaska; and it shall be the duty of all public officials charged with the duty of collecting or receiving such license fees or taxes to accept such certificates in lieu of money in payment of all license fees or taxes upon or against the pack of canned salmon at the ratio of 1,000 fry for each ten cases of salmon. No hatchery owner shall obtain the rebates from the output of any hatchery to which he might otherwise be entitled under this act unless the efficiency of said hatchery has first been approved by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor in the manner herein provided for.

SEC. 3. That the money derived from the license taxes, as provided for in section 1 of this act, shall be paid into the United States Treasury and shall constitute a permanent appropriation, to be known as the "Alaskan fisheries fund," to be used under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor for the purpose of propagation and fish culture and the construction and maintenance of fish hatcheries in the waters of Alaska; for the protection, regulation, investigation, and inspection of the Alaskan fisheries and hatcheries; for the collection and compilation of statistics and information pertaining thereto, and for the enforcement of the law and the regulations made thereunder with reference to the subject of fisheries in the waters of Alaska.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful to erect or maintain any dam, barricade, fence, trap, fish wheel, or other fixed or stationary obstruction, except for purposes of fish culture, in any of the waters of Alaska at any point where the distance from shore to shore is less than 500 feet, or within 500 yards of the mouth of any red-salmon stream where the same is less than 500 feet in width, with the purpose or result of capturing salmon or preventing or impeding their ascent to their spawning grounds; and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby authorized and directed to have any and all such unlawful obstructions removed or destroyed.

SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful to lay or set any drift net, seine, set net, pound net, trap, or any other fishing appliance for any purpose except for purposes of fish culture, across or above the tide waters of any creek, stream, river, estuary, or lagoon, for a distance greater than one-third the width of such creek, stream, river, estuary, or lagoon, or within 100 yards outside of the mouth of any red-salmon stream where the same is less than 500 feet in width. It shall be unlawful to lay or set any seine or net of any kind within 100 yards of any other seine, net, or other fishing appliance which is being or which has been laid or set in any of the waters of Alaska, or to drive or construct any trap or other fixed fishing appliance within 600 yards laterally or within 100 yards endwise of any other trap or fixed fishing appliance.

SEC. 6. That it shall be unlawful to fish for, take, or kill any salmon of any species in any manner or by any means except by rod, spear, or gaff, in any of the waters of Alaska over which the United States has jurisdiction, except Cook Inlet, the delta of Copper River, Bering Sea, and the waters tributary thereto, from 6 o'clock p. m. of Saturday of each week until 6 o'clock a. m. of the Monday following, or to fish for or catch or kill in any manner or by any appliances except by rod, spear, or gaff, any salmon in any stream of less than 100 yards in width in Alaska between the hours of 6 o'clock in the evening and 6 o'clock in the morning of the following day of each and every day of the week. Throughout the weekly close season herein prescribed the gate, mouth, or tunnel of all stationary and floating traps shall be closed, and 25 feet of the webbing or net of the "heart" of such traps on each side next to the "pot" shall be lifted or lowered in such manner as to permit the free passage of salmon and other fishes.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may, in his discretion, set aside any streams or lakes as preserves for spawning grounds, in which fishing may be limited or entirely prohibited; and when, in his judgment, the results of fishing operations in any stream, or off the mouth thereof, indicate that the number of salmon taken is larger than the natural production of salmon in such stream, he is authorized to establish close seasons or to limit or prohibit fishing entirely for one year or more within such stream or within 500 yards of the mouth thereof, so as to permit salmon to increase: Provided, however, That such power shall be exercised only after all persons interested shall be given a hearing, of which due notice must be given by publication; and where the interested parties are known to the Department they shall be personally notified by a notice mailed not less than thirty days previous to such hearing. No order made under this section shall be effective before the next calendar year after same is made: And provided further, That such limitations and prohibitions shall not apply to those engaged in catching salmon who keep such streams fully stocked with salmon by artificial propagation.

SEC. 8. That it shall be unlawful to can or salt for sale for food any salmon more than forty-eight hours after it has been killed.

SEC. 9. That is shall be unlawful for any person, company, or corporation wantonly to waste or destroy salmon or other food fishes taken or caught in any of the waters of Alaska.

SEC. 10. That it shall be unlawful for any person, company, or corporation canning, salting, or curing fish of any species in Alaska to use any label, brand, or trade-mark which shall tend to misrepresent the contents of any package of fish offered for sale: Provided, That the use of the terms "red," "medium red," "pink," "chum," etc., as applied to the various species of Pacific salmon under present trade usages shall not be deemed in conflict with the provisions of this act when used to designate salmon of those known species.

SEC. 11. That every person, company, and corporation engaged in catching, curing, or in any manner utilizing fishery products, or in operating fish hatcheries in Alaska, shall make detailed annual reports thereof to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, on blanks furnished by him, covering all such facts as may be required with respect thereto for the information of the Department. Such reports shall be sworn to by the superintendent, manager, or other person having knowledge of the facts, a separate blank form being used for each establishment in cases where more than one cannery, saltery, or other establishment is conducted by a person, company, or corporation, and the same shall be forwarded to the Department at the close of the fishing season and not later than December 15 of each year.

SEC. 12. That the catching or killing, except with rod, spear, or gaff, of any fish of any kind or species whatsoever in any of the waters of Alaska over which the United States has jurisdiction shall be subject to the provisions of this act, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby authorized to make and establish such rules and regulations not inconsistent with law as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act, and such rules and regulations shall have the force and effect of law.

SEC. 13. That to enforce the provisions of this act and such regulations as he may establish in pursuance thereof, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is authorized and directed to depute, in addition to the agent and asistant agent of salmon fisheries now provided by law, from the officers and employees of the Department of Commerce and Labor, a force adequate to the performance of all work required for the proper investigation, inspection, and regulation of the Alaskan fisheries and hatcheries, and he shall annually submit to Congress estimates to cover the cost of the establishment and maintenance of fish hatcheries in Alaska, the salaries and actual traveling expenses of such officials, and for such other expenditures as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 14. That any person, company, corporation, or association violating any provision of this act or any regulation established in pursuance thereof shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment at hard labor for a term of not more than ninety days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court; and in case of the violation of any of the provisions of section 4 of this act and conviction thereof a further fine of not more than $250 per diem may, at the discretion of the court, be imposed for each day such obstruction is maintained. And every vessel or other apparatus or equipment used or employed in violation of any provision of this act, or of any regulation made thereunder, may be seized by order of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and shall be held subject to the payment of such fine or fines as may be imposed.

SEC. 15. That the violation of any provision of this act or of any regulation made thereunder may be prosecuted in any district court of Alaska or any district court of the United States in the States of California, Oregon, or Washington. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to enforce the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations made thereunder. And it shall be the duty of the district attorney to whom any violation is reported by any agent or representative of the Department of Commerce and Labor to institute proceedings necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 16. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are, so far as inconsistent, hereby repealed.

SEC. 17. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I demand a second.

Mr. CAPRON. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Rhode Island is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Indiana to twenty minutes.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that anyone who will look at the merits of the bill probably would need any information about it. If there is any gentleman who desires to ask any question I shall be glad to tell anything I know about it, and that is the whole story. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill. I know very little about its general provisions, but there is one provision in the bill that ought not to be contained in any bill to be operative anywhere. It confers upon the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the power to make rules and regulations which shall have the force and effect of law, and it imposes criminal penalties for violation of those regulations. I do not believe that Congress ought to delegate the power to enact criminal legislation to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor or to any other administrative officer of the Government.

Mr. DALZELL. Do you think Congress can delegate it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not think it can, and I do not think it ought to if it could.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman from Indiana believe that it is within the power of Congress to delegate such a power to any Cabinet officer or to any other officer?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not believe it is within the power of Congress to delegate its legislative authority, but certainly I think we ought not in terms to seem to confer any such authority or undertake to confer any such authority. There is altogether too much vesting of arbitrary power in the Department officials in our legislation; but when a bill goes to the extent of conferring on the head of a Department the making of rules and regulations and provides that such rules and regulations shall have the force and effect of law, and then provides a system of penalties for the violation of rules and regulations that neither Congress nor anybody can possibly know anything about when the bill is passed, it is most vicious and indefensible from every standpoint. Whether the provision be valid or not, the bill ought to be defeated.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to make a suggestion to my friend from Indiana, that this question he is now discussing has been passed upon by the district judges of three of the Pacific coast districts, where a regulation under act of Congress relating to forests was made, providing a criminal penalty, and each of those judges held that the regulation was invalid; that the power to make a regulation the violation of which would be criminal could not be delegated.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not see how a court could hold otherwise.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Perhaps those decisions might not be applicable here. The legislation of Congress had already created the crime for which those regulations sought to inflict the punishment, and the regulation only defined what should be a violation of the general statute. Here is an attempt to create a crime by the legislative act of an executive officer. I do not believe it is valid.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not think it is valid, and I do not think it ought to be contained in the bill. I think the presence of it in the bill is sufficient to justify every man in the House, no matter how strongly he may be in favor of the regulation of the fisheries in Alaska, in voting against the measure. I believe the gentleman ought to withdraw his motion to suspend the rules and correct the bill in that respect.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to suggest further to my friend from Indiana that that question afterwards came up in the House, and Congress expressly enacted a provision making a crime of the specific acts that had been covered by the regulations. The regulations having been held invalid, the matter was met by direct Congressional action.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What difference does that make with this provision?

Mr. LACEY. It is right along the line of the gentleman's contention. Congress afterwards acted and passed the proper provision of law in place of the regulation which had been held invalid.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I would state in explanation that when this matter came before the Committee on Territories there were two bills relating to fisheries in Alaska. One of them prohibited aliens from taking fish in the waters of Alaska, the other being this bill to regulate the fisheries of Alaska. This provision giving to the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor authority to make rules and regulations which should have the force and effect of law was contained in both bills. When the other bill, to wit, the bill prohibiting aliens from fishing in the waters of Alaska—the alien bill—came up in this House, the House struck out of it the language "and such rules and regulations shall have the force and effect of law."

I do not think there is any objection to striking that language out of this bill. I think, as a matter of fact, the objection raised by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] is a very forcible one, and that we have no authority to confer legislative power upon any Executive Department.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent—I think the gentleman in charge of the bill will not object—that I may suggest an amendment that will remedy the objection. I think the objection is a serious one, that probably will or at least ought to defeat the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to offer the following amendment, which the Clerk will report:

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Strike out in line 18, page 17, the words "or of any regulation made thereunder;" and strike out all after the word "act" in line 10, page 16; that is, all of section 12, the words to be stricken out being "and such rules and regulations shall have the force and effect of law."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16, lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "and such rules and regulations shall have the force and effect of law;" and on page 17, line 18, strike out the words "or of any regulation made thereunder."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The question being taken, the rules were suspended; and two-thirds voting in the affirmative, the bill with the amendments was passed.

YOSEMITE VALLEY GRANT AND MARIPOSA BIG TREE GROVE.

Mr. GILLETT of California. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 118) accepting the recession by the State of California of the Yosemite Valley grant and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove, and including the same, together with fractional sections 5 and 6, township 5 south, range 22 east, Mount Diablo meridian, California, within the metes and bounds of the Yosemite National Park, and changing the boundaries thereof.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the recession and regranting unto the United States by the State of California of the cleft or gorge in the granite peak of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, situated in the county of Mariposa, State of California, and the headwaters of the Merced River, and known as the Yosemite Valley, with its branches or spurs, granted unto the State of California in trust for public use, resort, and recreation by the act of Congress entitled "An act authorizing a grant to the State of California of the Yosemite Valley and of the land embracing the Mariposa Big Tree Grove," approved June 30, 1864 (13 Stat., p. 325), as well as the tracts embracing what is known as the "Mariposa Big Tree Grove," likewise granted unto the State of California by the aforesaid act of Congress, is hereby ratified and accepted, and the tracts of land embracing the Yosemite Valley and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove, as described in the act of Congress approved June 30, 1864, together with that part of fractional sections 5 and 6, township 5 south, range 22 east, Mount Diablo meridian, California, lying south of the South Fork of Merced River and almost wholly between the Mariposa Big Tree Grove and the present south boundary of the Yosemite National Park, be, and the same are hereby, reserved and withdrawn from settlement, occupancy, or sale under the laws of the United States and set apart as reserved forest lands, subject to all the limitations, conditions, and provisions of the act of Congress approved October 1, 1890, entitled "An act to set apart certain tracts of land in the State of California as forest reservations," as well as the limitations, conditions, and provisions of the act of Congress approved February 7, 1905, entitled "An act to exclude from the Yosemite National Park, California, certain lands therein described, and to attach and include the said lands in the Sierra Forest Reserve," and shall hereafter form a part of the Yosemite National Park.

The south and west boundary lines of the Yosemite National Park are hereby changed as follows: Beginning at the point on the line between sections 35 and 36, township 4 south, range 21 east, where same intersects the middle of the channel of the South Fork of the Merced River; thence north on section line to the southwest corner of section 25; thence west on section lines to the southwest corner of section 28; thence north on section line to the northwest corner of section 28; thence west on section line to the quarter-section corner between sections 20 and 21; thence north through the middle of section 20 to the center thereof; thence east through the middle of section 20 to the quarter-section corner between sections 20 and 21; thence north on section line to the quarter-section corner between sections 16 and 17; thence west through middle of section 17 to the center thereof; thence north through the middle of sections 17, 8, and 5 to the quarter-section corner of north boundary of section 5 on township boundary, all in township 4 south, range 21 east; thence north through the middle of section 32, township 3 south, range 21 east, to the center thereof; thence west through the middle of section 32, said township, and section 36, township 3 south, range 20 east, to the quarter-section corner between sections 35 and 36; thence north on section line to the quarter-section corner between sections 25 and 26; thence east through the middle of section 25 to the center thereof; thence north through the middle of sections 25 and 24 to the center of section 24; thence west through the middle of sections 24, 23, and 22 to the quarter-section corner between sections 21 and 22, township 3 south, range 20 east, on the present western boundary of the Yosemite National Park. And all that portion of the Yosemite National Park lying between the boundary line last above mentioned and the present boundary line of said national park is excluded from said park; and the said lands so excluded, and all thereof, are added to and made a part of the Sierra Forest Reserve, and shall hereafter form a part of said Sierra Forest Reserve, and shall be subject to all of the acts of Congress with relation thereto: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may require the payment of such price as he may deem proper for privileges on the land herein segregated from the Yosemite National Park and made a part of the Sierra Forest Reserve accorded under the act approved February 15, 1901, relating to rights of way over certain parks, reservations, and other lands, and other acts concerning rights of way over public lands: And provided further, That in the grant of any right of way for railway purposes across the lands placed under this measure within the Sierra Forest Reserve it shall be stipulated that no logs or timber shall be hauled over the same without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, and under regulations to be promulgated by him.

SEC. 2. That none of the lands patented and in private ownership in the area hereby included in the Sierra Forest Reserve shall have the privileges of the lieu-land scrip provisions of the land laws, but otherwise to be in all respects under the laws and regulations affecting the forest reserves, and immediately upon the passage of this act all laws, rules, and regulations affecting forest reservations, including the right to change the boundaries thereof by Executive proclamation, shall take effect and be in force within the limits of the territory excluded by this act from the Yosemite National Park, except as herein otherwise provided.

SEC. 3. That all revenues derived from privileges in the park authorized under the act of October 1, 1890, the act of February 7, 1905, as well as under this measure, or from privileges accorded on the lands herein segregated from said park and included within the Sierra Forest Reserve, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in the management, protection, and improvement of the Yosemite National Park.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

There was no demand for a second.

The question on the passage of the bill was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, House joint resolution 77 on the same subject was laid on the table.

RESTRICTING RIGHT OF APPEAL IN HABEAS CORPUS PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 17948) restricting in certain cases the right of appeal to the Supreme Court in habeas corpus proceedings.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from a final decision by a court of the United States in a proceeding in habeas corpus where the detention complained of is by virtue of process issued out of a State court no appeal to the Supreme Court shall be allowed unless the United States court by which the final decision was rendered or a justice of the Supreme Court shall be of opinion that there exists probable cause for an appeal, in which event, on allowing the same, the said court or justice shall certify that there is probable cause for such allowance.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to demand a second, I want to say that it is now after 5 o'clock. I do not want to know what is coming up next, because I think, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] says, we ought to "take out." I will not demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the request of Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee for absence, indefinitely, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object, Mr. Speaker. I move that the request of the gentleman from Tennessee be granted.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF THE INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States: which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the consideration of the Congress, a report made to the Secretary of War by the International Waterways Commission, under date of May 3, 1906, upon the preservation of Niagara Falls.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 7, 1906.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 8, 1906.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. DUBOIS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

LANDS IN NEW MEXICO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office inclosing a report of the investigation of the contract for the sale of certain lands belonging to the Territory of New Mexico, and stating that Congress alone has the power to enforce the conditions of the grant; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT VERSAILLES, KY.

Mr. SCOTT. Before the morning business is closed, I should like to call up, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. 4956) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building at Versailles, in the State of Kentucky. I am sure there is not a Senator on this floor who will object to the bill when he knows the character of it.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, after line 5, to strike out the following words:

No money shall be used for the purpose mentioned until a valid title to the site of said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Kentucky shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including heating and ventilating apparatus, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices, in the city of Versailles and State of Kentucky, the cost of said site and building, including said heating and ventilating apparatus, complete, not to exceed $25,000.

Proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least twenty days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals.

The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATUE OF GOVERNOR STEVENS T. MASON, OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. ALGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 47) granting condemned cannon for a statue to Governor Stevens T. Mason, of Michigan.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of War to deliver to the governor of the State of Michigan six bronze or brass condemned cannon, to be used to make a life-size statue of Stevens T. Mason, late governor of Michigan.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORTIFICATION OF PURE SWEET WINES.

Mr. FLINT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15266) to amend existing laws relative to the fortification of pure sweet wines.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Is there a report from the Department on the bill? If there is, I should like to have it read.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina object to the present consideration of the bill just read?

Mr. TILLMAN. There seems to be some trouble about its going through.

Mr. FLINT. It comes with a unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think there is any trouble about the bill. It has been very carefully considered both by the committee and by the Department.

Mr. STONE. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

ENTRY OF LANDS UNDER RECLAMATION ACT.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask the Senator from South Carolina to allow a House bill which came over to be taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from South Carolina that the morning business has not yet been closed. The Chair will lay the unfinished business before the Senate as soon as the morning business is concluded. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives:

H. R. 18536. An act providing for the subdivision of lands entered under the reclamation act, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. DUBOIS. I move that section 3 of the bill be stricken out and that the following be inserted. I will say to the Senate——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the bill is not before the Senate. Does the Senator from Idaho wish the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. KEAN. Has the bill been reported by a committee of the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not been.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that the Senate has passed a bill on the same subject as the third section, and the House committee has unanimously reported in favor of the same bill.

Mr. KEAN. Then a bill on the same subject has been reported by the Senate committee?

Mr. DUBOIS. Yes. I will ask the Senate to substitute the bill which has passed the Senate for section 3, and then it will go into conference.

Mr. TELLER. This is a pretty important bill, and it seems to me it is hardly wise to put the bill into conference without some examination on the part of the Senate.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that the Senate committee has had a similar bill under consideration and has passed one bill covering entirely section 3, which same bill has been reported unanimously by the House committee. However, I have no objection to its going to the committee except that it will delay it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, what we are just now in danger of in the West is too much legislation on this very question. We are threatened with very dangerous legislation, and if the Department or some portion of the Department, which have the Reclamation Service in charge, have their way there is not an intelligent man in the West who in two years will not regret that the Government ever touched this question. I do not know whether this bill is objectionable or not, but I think we are entitled to have an opportunity to examine these bills. Therefore I am going to insist that the bill shall go to the committee for action, and that we shall be given an opportunity to be heard if we have any objection to it.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho suggest that the bill be referred to the Committee on Irrigation?

Mr. DUBOIS. To the Committee on Irrigation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be so referred.

REMOVAL OF DERELICTS, ETC.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5683) to provide for the removal of derelicts and other floating dangers to navigation, which were in line 4, after the word "constructed," to insert a comma and the words "at a cost not to exceed $250,000," and to strike out all of section 2.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2296) restoring to the public domain certain lands in the State of Minnesota, which was, on page 1, line 7, after the word "lots," to strike out "five and six" and insert "one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, and nine."

Mr. NELSON. I move that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

SANITARIUM IN MINNESOTA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4976) to grant certain land to the State of Minnesota to be used as a site for the construction of a sanitarium for the treatment of consumptives.

The amendments of the House were, in line 3, to strike out all after "Minnesota" down to and including "consumptives," in line 5.

In line 8, to strike out all after the word "That" down to and including "States," in line 11, and insert "said State shall pay therefor at the rate of $1.25 per acre."

Mr. NELSON. I move that the amendments of the House be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $6,000 for alterations in and additions to the public building at Salt Lake City, Utah, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLINT submitted an amendment authorizing the Postmaster-General, on account of the earthquake calamity in California, to use the average daily weight of mails for a period of not less than thirty successive working days ascertained during the period from February 20 to April 17, 1906, in adjusting the compensation on all railroad routes in the fourth section, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On April 27:

S. 5520. An act to amend an act entitled "An act granting to the Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad Company the power to sell and convey to the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Company all the railway property, rights, franchises, and privileges of the Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad Company, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1905.

On May 7:

S. 956. An act providing for the election of a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the Territory of Alaska.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Are there concurrent or other resolutions? If not, the morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WARNER. I send an amendment to the desk to be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a pending amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WARNER. I will ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. After the last line of the substitute of the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] for the amendment of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] insert:

It shall be the duty of carriers engaged in interstate commerce to give like accommodations to all persons paying the same compensation for interstate transportation of passengers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment found on page 6497 of the RECORD was adopted. It reads as follows:

In line 5 of the proposed amendment, after the word "water," insert "at any place within the jurisdiction or within the governmental authority of the United States."

I will state to the Senate that this amendment was proposed by the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and was adopted. I desire to make a motion to reconsider it; and as I see he is not in his seat, I will let the motion be pending until he comes into the Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] to the modified amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. The Secretary will read the amendment to the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 4 of the proposed substitute, after the word "commerce," insert the words "as a common carrier of articles and commodities of its own production, mining, or manufacture."

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the original amendment be read as it would read if amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of section 1 the following proposed substitute offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], which if amended by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] would read as follows:

It shall be unlawful for any common carrier engaged in producing, manufacturing, buying, furnishing, or selling, directly or indirectly, coal, coke, or any other commodity, to engage in interstate commerce as a common carrier of articles and commodities of its own production, mining, or manufacture: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent a carrier from mining coal or producing other commodities exclusively for its own use.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I think, Mr. President, everyone is agreed that we should absolutely divorce our railways as common carriers from engaging in any character of business in competition with any person, firm, or corporation. Being agreed upon that, then we are brought face to face with this proposition. Under the bill, or under the amendment, as it now stands, in my opinion, it would be clearly unconstitutional. Suppose that a company in the State of Maryland, under the laws of that State, engages, as it has a right to engage, in the mining and selling of products purely within that State. That being the case, is it possible for Congress to enact a law which would forfeit the right of that company to do an interstate-commerce business in property that it is not buying or selling within the State? Any prohibition such as is contained in the provision of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia would, in effect, take this private property of the carrier without due process of law, in my opinion, and it would be absolutely unconstitutional.

What the Senator, I presume, really wants to secure, and what we all wish to secure, is an amendment that will prohibit railway companies as much as possible from engaging in interstate commerce in articles of their own production. That may be obtained, it seems to me, by a very few words, much less than are contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment. Suppose that the provision should simply read this way:

Any common carrier under the provisions of this act is prohibited from engaging in marketing or selling any coal, coke, or other commodity entering into interstate commerce.

That is a simple proposition. He would be prohibited from entering into that business only, if entering into it, he engaged in interstate commerce in connection with it. That would bring it under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution and the authority of Congress to deal with it. It is a simple proposition and covers entirely what is desired by the Senator from West Virginia. The proposition is in a very few words:

Any common carrier under the provisions of this act is prohibited from engaging in marketing or selling any coal, coke, or other commodity entering into interstate commerce.

That would leave the company free to engage in that business in the State which allowed the company to so engage. It would prohibit the company from engaging in the sale of any commodity which would enter into interstate commerce. It would be comprehensive and, at the same time, simple, clear, and definite.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the Senator offer that as an amendment to the substitute?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I can not offer it as an amendment now, because I understand that one amendment to the amendment is pending, and I simply present it as a suggestion. I will ask the Chair whether an amendment would at this time be in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that it is not now in order.

Mr. MCCUMBER. It was my opinion that it is not now in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I send it to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for the amendment just read, at the end of section 1, in lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted, add the following:

Any common carrier under the provisions of this act is prohibited from engaging in marketing or selling any coal, coke, or other commodity entering into interstate commerce.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest, then, that after the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia has been perfected by its friends the proposed substitute of the Senator from North Dakota will be in order.

Mr. DRYDEN. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from West Virginia whether there is any provision in the bill as to the time when his amendment, if adopted, will go into operation and become effective upon the railroads? I will state the point of my inquiry. The carrying of coal to the markets from the mines has to be done by these carrying companies. If it be true, as is commonly believed, that the carrying companies own property valued perhaps at hundreds of millions of dollars, and that the only way the public can get the coal is through these companies, there should be, in my judgment, a time set for the operation of this law to go into effect. If not, two things are sure to result: First, an enormous injustice to the carrying companies and all the holders of their securities, and, second, tremendous distress to the public, because if these companies are shut off without proper notice and without due time for the disposal of their property the public will be positively unable to get the coal which they must have for their use. Now, is a reasonable time limit set for the operation of the law to take effect? If not, should it not be done? I should like to ask the view of the Senator from West Virginia on that point.

Mr. ELKINS. In the original draft of the amendment under discussion, and which I drew——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DRYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I think we are entitled to know what is going on in the Senate, and unless Senators speak louder than they have been speaking, with the noise there is, we might as well retire to the cloakroom.

Mr. DRYDEN. I have asked a question of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. TELLER. I have not heard a word the Senator from New Jersey has said, and I have listened intently.

Mr. DRYDEN. The point of my inquiry, I will say to the Senator from Colorado, is whether there is any provision in the bill to set a time when the bill shall go into operation if it becomes a law, and particularly with reference to the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia. I say this question is so broad that it is not too strong a statement to make to say that it will affect almost every household in this country. This amendment which is now pending is one of the most vital in the whole bill, and if this amendment as proposed be incorporated in the bill and become a law—and there is no time set for the bill going into operation, as I understand—then I say that the people of this entire country will be prevented from getting their supply of coal; every household, every great manufacturing concern, the railroads themselves which do not own their own coal mines, every industry and every individual to-day dependent for comfort and life upon the supply of coal, would be prohibited from getting a supply under the operation of this amendment. Therefore, if there is no such provision, I propose to offer a proposition to that end, and I should like to know what the real situation is.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I will inquire whether or not the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] has concluded?

Mr. DRYDEN. I have for the present.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, of course there is no provision in this bill as to when it shall take effect, and therefore, as in the case of other bills, it will take effect on its approval by the President. In my judgment it is rather unfortunate that this feature should be put into the bill. While there is an evil unquestionably in allowing railroad corporations to mine coal or to manufacture products of any kind, yet we might as well face the fact that that is something which we can not prevent, at least until the article so produced or manufactured shall enter into interstate commerce. The State of New Jersey, if it sees fit so to do, may charter a railroad company and authorize it, in addition to doing its railroad business, to do something else. If the State of New Jersey sees fit to authorize it so to do, such railroad company may mine coal or it may manufacture cotton goods or anything else. The power of a corporation is derived from the State and not from the General Government. A corporation is entirely outside of the control of the General Government as to what it shall do until it enters the domain of interstate commerce.

Mr. President, it is not unlawful for some corporations in the State of Pennsylvania to mine coal, because, as I understand, they are authorized so to do by their charters. I do not believe any railroad company in the State of Colorado could, within its charter, mine coal; but it is certainly within the power of the State of Colorado to authorize it to do so if the State thinks the interests of the public would be promoted by its so doing. So the mining of coal by a railroad corporation is not an offense against law in the State of Pennsylvania, though it is an offense in some States; and the company which should mine coal might subject itself to the danger of losing its charter. But I take it for granted that where railroad companies are mining coal in the eastern sections of the country they are doing so by some specific authority of the State. Under their charter they have a right to mine coal and to ship it on their cars, but when they reach the State line, then, Mr. President, that coal becomes the subject of our jurisdiction, and we can then have something to say about it.

Suppose a railroad company mines large quantities of coal and ships it out on terms exactly the same as it ships other people's coal, under precisely similar conditions, making no discrimination between that corporation and any other; there is not any reason for finding fault with that, and that is not the complaint. The complaint is that the railroad company, having the opportunity to furnish cars for its own coal and to carry its own coal for a rate of freight that it does not carry other coal, avails itself of that opportunity, and so becomes a hostile competitor, not a competitor in the proper sense of the term, but a favored competitor with others engaged in the same business—that is, in mining coal—who do not happen to own a railroad to carry it. In my judgment, when a company does that and carries its coal, and such coal becomes a subject of interstate commerce, when it is transported outside of the State, then we have control.

In my judgment, we do not have any control until that thing happens; and this corporation organized in Pennsylvania, holding its right to mine coal and selling its coal only within the boundaries of that State, that coal not being the subject of interstate commerce, but of domestic consumption, it is absolutely beyond our control. That is a question which is presented to us here, and as a matter of principle there is not anything more important than that in the whole bill; not even rate making is more important than that. I think, Mr. President, no railroad company ought to be so chartered. As a matter of policy, the States ought not to authorize that; but they have authorized it, and they may continue to authorize it.

I want to repeat that it is a subject we can not control, although it may be reprehensible and objectionable. We can not meet everything we may object to with a remedy.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TELLER. I will yield for a question, but I do not propose in the fifteen minutes I have got to yield to an argument.

Mr. FORAKER. I only want to state to the Senator that I agree with all that he has said as to the legal aspect of this proposition; but I wish to call his attention and ask for the benefit of his view as to what would happen if our legislation should be enacted as proposed and it should be held to be constitutional, and we would thereby prohibit railroads who are now engaged in mining and manufacturing coal from sending it out as interstate commerce and supplying the people with it.

Mr. TELLER. I would rather not consider a question that seems to me to be so exceedingly remote. I can not conceive that any court in this country entitled to be called a court would hold that we have that right. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] has touched upon that subject. I only want to deal with the question, How are you to reach this matter, if you reach it at all? I should myself very much prefer that this question should come to us in a separate bill, where it could be considered by itself, and not interfere with this general bill, which the public have been looking for and expecting us to pass in some shape or form for the last two years, or nearly that time.

Mr. President, whenever coal or anything else that the railroads may produce becomes the subject of interstate commerce, then I admit the United States may put its power in operation and may control it.

I only want to say a few words, for I know that fifteen minutes do not give an opportunity for any real discussion of this question; but I want to enter my protest here against that which I know has the sanction of a very high court. When the Constitution of the United States authorized us to regulate interstate commerce it did not authorize us to destroy commerce, and although there may be high authority to the effect that the power to regulate means the power to control, and I may be compelled to accept that in some cases, I am not compelled to accept it as binding upon me when I come to a positive act of my own. I may refrain, Mr. President, from doing some things that I should like to do as a member of this body. I may withhold my vote from a certain proposition because the court has said substantially that such a proposition would be a nullity; but the court can not compel me to act affirmatively when it comes to legislation. I may withhold my assent then. I can make my objection, although the court says the act may be constitutional, if, in my judgment, it is impolitic, and especially if, in my judgment, it would work injustice.

Mr. President, I suppose we shall have to deal with the subject as it is here. I want to deal with it, not upon the theory that the people who are mining coal are guilty of a crime by mining it, for if they are guilty of any offense against either law or morals, it is in that they take advantage of the condition they are in to unfairly compete with others who are engaged in the same business. Beyond that I do not believe we ought to go.

This amendment has been, in my judgment, rather hastily drawn, and I am not satisfied with it. I myself do not believe that in a time of haste, when we are endeavoring to get through with this bill, is a good time to introduce this question. Yet it is an evil, I admit, that we have got to wrestle with in the near and immediate future.

Mr. President, this bill has been before Congress a good while, and it has been pending here something like ten weeks, I think. I have not believed that it required any great haste on our part. It has been pretty thoroughly discussed upon one feature principally, and that is as to what should be the condition when the Interstate Commerce Commission has declared that a rate made by a railroad company was an improper one; what should be the right of the carrier and also the shipper, for that matter, when the condition arrives that the court has passed upon the rate made by the railroad company and declared it an improper one; what, then, shall be the condition when the carrier goes into court, and what court shall he go into, and what questions shall be considered there?

We have heard, Mr. President, about "broad review" and a "limited review." I think, as a general rule, that a man brought up in the profession to which I belong would hesitate somewhat to provide in a matter of this kind for a limited review. In the first place, I think he would be somewhat at sea when he began to try to determine as to what particular thing this review should go; and then I think he would be very much embarrassed for fear he might not give to the carrier such a review as he is entitled to under the Constitution of the United States. So, Mr. President, it has generally been understood here, I think—I have tried to make it so—that, so far as I am concerned, I am in favor of such a review as will enable the carrier, if he says his rights have been invaded by the Commission, to go into court to determine that question.

We are told that an agreement is to be made amongst the friends of this bill, of which I count myself one, as to the character of the review to be provided; but concerning that agreement I admit I have not been consulted.

We heard yesterday or the day before that an amendment was to be offered by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], but it did not come. On Saturday we heard of it, on Sunday we heard of it, and yesterday we heard of it. We have not seen it yet, but a newspaper man, who at least thinks he knows what it is, handed me a paper and said that it contained the gist of the proposed review provision.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is obliged to inform the Senator from Colorado that his time has expired.

Mr. TELLER. Well, I will take occasion later, when some other amendment is pending, to finish my remarks. I will not undertake to violate the rule.

Mr. DICK. Mr. President, the inquiry of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] is both pertinent and important. Either the time should be extended very considerably or this matter should be dealt with in an entirely separate bill. In the first place, we recall that some years ago the iron masters of Pittsburg constructed a railroad, extending through a part of the State of Pennsylvania and a part of the State of Ohio, to reach the ports of Lake Erie for the purpose of carrying iron ore from the Lake ports to Pittsburg because of extortionate rates charged them by the railroads. If this amendment is adopted and that road is still in the possession of the men who constructed it, they must either go out of the business of manufacturing steel or the business of common carriers.

Again, we adopted in the early part of the voting an amendment putting pipe lines into the list of common carriers; and the men who own pipe lines, whether the companies are large or small, will be compelled, if this amendment is adopted, either to go out of the business of pumping and refining oil or out of the business of conveying it.

Within a few days the Committee on Territories favorably reported a bill chartering a railroad in the district of Alaska, its purpose being largely to mine coal and other minerals, and the bill grants certain coal-mining privileges in that district. The company means to mine that coal, to convey it to a seaport, and thence to the Pacific coast. It will have to change these arrangements, and perhaps abandon the enterprise altogether, if it is confined entirely to the business of a common carrier and prohibited from engaging in the business of mining.

Ample illustrations might be given, in addition to the illustration made by the Senator from New Jersey or the one made previously by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], when he referred to the lumber industries of the South. It extends still further. Great companies are mining iron ore in Michigan and in Wisconsin. They own vessels for the transportation of that ore from where it is mined to points where it is consumed in the manufacture of steel. They will have to go out of the business of mining or out of the business of common carriers.

So that, in all its ramifications, this question is so great, it affects so many interests, not only the interests of capital, but the interests of labor as well, that it seems to me the question itself is quite as important, and perhaps of even greater importance, than this matter of railroad-rate regulation, in that railroad-rate legislation has been a question that has been dealt with by Congress for more than twenty years. This very bill is but a conformation of old legislation to newer conditions, but this particular question is a new and a very important question. It is to be hoped the Congress will see that it is a wise thing to do to defer action upon so important a matter until the pending rate legislation is out of the way and it can be dealt with as a separate and distinct proposition in important legislation.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, the purpose of introducing this amendment was to correct an abuse and evil growing up in the State of West Virginia and in other mining States, owing to the fact that railroads engage in competition with producers on their lines. My idea of this is, and it is my judgment, that railroads should be strictly held to doing the business for which they are incorporated—that is, the transportation of freight and passengers, and should be prohibited by law from engaging in any other business, and especially business in competition with the producers and shippers on their lines.

When I first drew this amendment I inserted the words "unless authorized by its charter to do so," which were objected to yesterday by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. The amendment reads:

> It shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, unless authorized by its charter to do so, to engage, directly or indirectly, in the production, manufacture, buying, furnishing, or selling of coal or coke or any other commodity or commodities of commerce in competition with any shipper or producer on its line or lines, etc.

I put in the words objected to in order to meet the question raised partly by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DICK] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN]. For instance, the Reading Railroad, the Lackawanna Railroad, and probably the Pennsylvania Railroad took the right, by special acts of their legislatures fifty years ago, perhaps sixty years ago, to mine, sell, and produce coal. That right has never been questioned and I do not want to disturb vested rights.

It is impossible, under the general incorporation acts of the various States authorizing the organization and incorporation of railroads, for them now to get the power to mine and sell coal. The power of the railroads to mine and sell coal and coke and engage in any other business was derived from special acts of the legislatures. With the vested rights growing out of these special acts I did not want to interfere at all, and, therefore, I put in the words "unless authorized by their charters to do so."

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] says that would work injustice, because all the railroad companies would have to do would be to organize not only to transport freight and passengers, but to engage in the mining business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to the fact that, upon consulting the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings, he finds the Senator from West Virginia took the floor upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN].

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the Chair's interpretation of the unanimous consent agreement, the Senator from West Virginia is not in order to speak to that amendment.

Mr. ELKINS. I am speaking to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That amendment is not pending.

Mr. ELKINS. Well, I must speak to some amendment. [Laughter.] I can not speak to my own amendment. Other Senators took all of my time on that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair regrets that he is obliged——

Mr. ELKINS. Can I speak to the substitute? I did not exhaust my fifteen minutes on the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. But the Senator from West Virginia has exhausted the rule. The Chair, of course, can not enforce the rule. It must be left to Senators to observe it or not, according to their good judgment.

Mr. ELKINS. Senators took all my time yesterday asking questions, and I want to get a chance to explain my own amendment. Can the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], in his prolific mind, offer something here that I can speak to? [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. With the permission of the Chair, I will state to the Senator from West Virginia that the Senator from South Carolina exhausted his time on this amendment yesterday afternoon, but after this amendment is disposed of there will be opportunity for him to speak on others. I have something I am trying to get up here that may obviate some of this difficulty.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I listened yesterday afternoon to as wise a bit of advice from the lips of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] as I have heard yet uttered in this Chamber. I read it to the Senate from the RECORD. Speaking of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, the Senator from South Carolina said:

> So, Senators, you will not quickly dispose of it in any wise and judicious way. By careful consideration we may be able to discover a method by which we can accomplish what we seek to do, but unless we are very cautious we will make a mistake, and we had better go not quite far enough than to go too far.

The first task of the morning I set for myself was to read the entire statement of the Senator from South Carolina which preceded these concluding words of advice. What he said is still fresh in the mind of the Senate, and it is not my purpose to repeat it. I am willing to confess my entire inability, by further illustration along the lines of his observations, to illuminate the question to which he was addressing himself: but I wish to give to the Senate the benefit of the reflections that I have made at the invitation of the Senator from South Carolina, stated in as succinct a form as possible, and stated practically in the way of naked legal propositions.

In the first place, Mr. President, the question we are considering is how we may lay the hand of injunction upon corporations conducting a carrying trade between the States to prevent them from doing either that which the States have, by the express act of their legislatures, authorized them to do or, by a long period of acquiescence, permitted them to do.

The question of the power of Congress to prohibit commerce between the States has been passed on but once by the Supreme Court of the United States. The thing which Congress prohibited in that case was the transportation from State to State by express or railroad or by the hand of man of a lottery ticket, a thing connected with a gambling scheme, a thing which had been condemned by Congress time and time again. It had been excluded from the mails; it had been excluded from foreign commerce; and, Mr. President, the question of the power of Congress to prohibit that noxious thing was debated three times in the Supreme Court of the United States by the court's own invitation, and then only sustained by a vote of 5 to 4. I challenge any Senator to put his hand upon a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to the effect that Congress has the power to go within the borders of any State and lay its hand upon and stifle or crush the policy of that State as declared in its own legislation with respect to the development of its own resources as proposed by this amendment.

Take for illustration the State of North Carolina, rich in timber, possibly not so wealthy in capital as some of her neighbors. It is her laudable ambition that her timber shall be brought to the markets of the world; that her borders shall be filled with the industrious men who are to be engaged in that enterprise. She invites capital to come within her borders for investment. She gives by charter the privilege to a lumber company to accumulate a large area of timber land, the extent of which she may circumscribe. She permits the people who invest their money upon her hills to build highways into the forest in order that the lumber may be carried out and put into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce.

Does any Senator mean to say that it rests in the power of Congress, under the Constitution, to reverse that policy? If so, I should like to see the authority upon which it rests. Congress may, I think, without question provide that a carrier which is lawfully engaged within the borders of a State which created it in developing the resources of that State and which seeks unlawfully to gain an advantage in interstate commerce over its competitors in that particular product shall be excluded from participating in interstate commerce with respect to that product.

Congress can prevent a carrier from stifling competition by refusing to give cars, facilities in the way of side tracks, and other facilities. Congress can, with absolute certainty, in my judgment, prohibit a carrier from entering into interstate commerce in respect to particular traffic if it is trying to crush out its rivals. But, Mr. President, to say that Congress can cancel the policy of any State in respect to the development of its own resources by prohibiting the agencies of its creation from commercial intercourse upon equal terms with citizens of other States is to say that which I think is impossible; and I entirely agree with the legal conclusions that have been so clearly announced upon this subject by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN]. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair, the "noes" have it. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

The question recurs upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

Mr. MCCUMBER. I desire to offer a substitute.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota proposes a substitute, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia, it is proposed to insert the following:

> Any common carrier under the provisions of this act is prohibited from engaging in marketing or selling any coal, coke, or other commodity entering into interstate commerce.

Mr. ELKINS obtained the floor.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I was out of the Chamber a few moments ago, and I heard that an amendment had been voted upon offered by the Senator from Mississippi. I did not know that it was my amendment which was under discussion. I was told yesterday that it was not in order at that time to offer the amendment, and that the amendment was then only read to see how it would sound if it should be adopted. I do not know how the amendment got before the Senate or how it came to be voted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the amendment was offered, and soon after the bill was laid before the Senate the Chair announced that the question was on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Yesterday I stated that I offered it, but I was told that under the rules of the Senate it was out of order at that time and could not be offered until the substitute had been acted upon. For that reason I was not in a hurry to offer it again; also for that reason I was not in the Chamber to offer the amendment when the opportune time should come.

Mr. ELKINS. I should like to ask the Senator a question. As I understand, this was a verbal amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi yesterday, and the Senator also offered a substitute. It was the understanding in the Senate when we adjourned that he would perfect the substitute and offer it this morning.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I did not offer a substitute. The amendment was read at the time I presented it to the Senate, but I was told at that time that it was out of order to offer it because the substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia had not been acted upon.

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MCLAURIN. I now haye a substitute which I have prepared.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair was governed in the matter by the record of the Secretary. The proposed amendment of the Senator from Mississippi was stated by the Secretary, and at the request of Senators the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia was read with the proposed amendment of the Senator from Mississippi incorporated in it.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I am not complaining of the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand that the Senator is, but the Chair was simply advising the Senator as to the manner in which the proposed amendment came before the Senate.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator from Mississippi will permit me, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment was rejected be reconsidered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be reconsidered.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I now offer a substitute for the pending amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Withdrawing the proposed amendment heretofore submitted?

Mr. MCLAURIN. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed substitute.

The Secretary read as follows:

> It shall be unlawful for any corporation that mines or manufactures or produces any article or commodity of commerce for sale to engage in the business of interstate commerce as a carrier of any of its own products, mining, or manufacture; and it shall be unlawful for such corporation to charge, demand, collect, or receive any money or other thing for the carriage, as a carrier of interstate commerce, of any of the like kind of articles or commodities produced, mined, or manufactured by any other person, company, or corporation; and for a violation of this provision the person paying such charge or demand may recover in any State or Federal court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter an amount triple the amount so collected or paid, together with all costs of collection, including attorney's fees and costs of travel to and from and attendance upon court. If any such corporation shall engage in the business of a carrier of such articles or commodities as intrastate carrier it shall be unlawful for such corporation to engage in interstate commerce as a carrier of any kind of commerce.

Mr. ELKINS. I understand the substitute was read for information; it is not offered?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Mississippi to withdraw the amendment proposed yesterday and to offer the amendment just proposed in lieu of it.

Mr. MCLAURIN. That is correct, Mr. President.

Mr. ELKINS. I wish to speak to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MCCUMBER. As the record now stands, the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi yesterday was voted down. That disposed of that amendment. Then I introduced a substitute, upon which the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] started to speak. It was in order at that time.

That being the case, I ask the Chair if it is possible that this other substitute, the amendment which is now offered by the Senator from Mississippi, can be considered until the other amendment is disposed of? Which has precedence?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the rule to be that an amendment to the part to be stricken out is first in order. In other words, that the friends of a pending measure have a right to perfect it by way of amendment, and after it is made as perfect as they desire to make it, then the amendment in the nature of a substitute is put to the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am a friend of the measure, and the object of the substitute which I offered was to perfect it. I can not see wherein there should be a distinction between the two.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair asked the Senator some time ago if his proposition was in the nature of a substitute, and the Chair understood from the Senator that that was so, taking the place of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. McCUMBER. It was then laid aside until the other matter was disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then I offered it as a substitute.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct. But the Chair invites the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the fact that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi was first proposed and acted upon, and by unanimous consent the vote by which it was rejected was reconsidered. The Senator from Mississippi then withdrew his original amendment, and offered the one which has just been read by the Secretary.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will state to the Chair that I did not know that a motion to reconsider had been made. I did not hear it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes. So the Chair is of opinion that the proposed amendment of the Senator from Mississippi would take precedence.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, in urging my amendment to prohibit interstate carriers from engaging in any other business than transporting freight and passengers, or, rather, not to engage in any business in competition with shippers on their lines, I do not want to interfere with any vested rights which may exist by reason of special acts of State legislatures authorizing railroad companies to engage in mining and selling coal. I therefore left in the amendment as I drew it the words "unless authorized by their charters," feeling that no other charters would be granted by special acts of legislatures to railroad companies and permit them to engage in the business of mining and selling coal and producing lumber.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Chesapeake and Ohio case, a case that came up from West Virginia. Without taking the time of the Senate to read the decision, I will say that the court in effect decides that where a railroad company does not have, by an act of the legislature, expressly conferred upon it the power to engage in mining and selling coal under existing law the railroad company could not mine and sell coal. That was the decision of the court in the Chesapeake and Ohio case.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator repeat that statement?

Mr. ELKINS. As I understand the decision of the Supreme Court in the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad case, it being a railroad company chartered and organized under the laws of Virginia without the power definitely expressed in the charter to mine and sell coal, it did not have the right, under the laws of Congress to regulate commerce, to mine and sell coal, and the court decided that it could not do so.

Mr. President, we have here a decision of the Supreme Court clearly meeting the point raised, as I thought, by the Senator from New Jersey. The court did not hold that where a legislature had especially authorized a railroad company to mine and sell coal it could not engage in the business of mining and selling coal, and therefore, as I stated before, I put in the words "unless authorized by their charters." I am not able to say whether an act of Congress could go so far as to annul and destroy a special act of the legislature authorizing a railroad company to sell coal and under which it had owned coal lands and mined and sold coal for fifty years and had mortgaged said coal lands to secure bonds.

We will have no trouble on this score in the future, because under the general incorporation acts of the States railroads can not take power to engage in any other business than transporting freight and passengers, although they may take all sorts of power. Under the laws of West Virginia a railroad company is prohibited from engaging in the business of mining and selling coal.

This act of the legislature was passed in 1895 and prevents railroad companies from buying or selling coal or coke.

The object of this amendment is to incorporate in the laws of Congress just what the law of the State of West Virginia is on this subject. Now, I think the question raised by some Senators that the right to mine and sell coal by intrastate roads can not be interfered with disappears when it is disclosed that any common carrier subject to the provisions of the interstate-commerce laws—that means any interstate carrier—shall be prohibited from engaging in the mining, manufacture, and production of coal in competition with shippers, because under the decisions of the courts every local railroad in the States are interstate carriers. The mining and selling coal by railroad companies in competition with shippers on their lines is a great evil and abuse, and unless stopped by law the railroads of this country can acquire all the coal lands in a particular locality or State, and can crush out under this power to mine and sell coal all independent operators and individual miners, because they can favor their own interests and deny shippers many of the advantages they enjoy.

The answer to this may be that they can not discriminate; but a railroad company owning the coal and the means of transportation can discriminate in a way so as not to violate the law, and in the end the independent operators must yield, surrender, and go out of business.

What I am contending for in this amendment is that the independent operator, the individual mine owner, shall be protected in his business against the rapacity and injustice of railroads owning coal lands. No independent operator, no small mine owner, can afford to engage in competition with a railroad company that owns twenty or thirty or forty thousand acres of coal doing business in the same locality. I say it is perfectly competent for Congress to pass such legislation. The law of West Virginia on this subject has been sustained. Congress by proper laws should forbid railroad companies from engaging in any business in competition with shippers on their lines.

It seems to me that the substitute offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] is clear, explicit, and to the point. It says it shall be unlawful, using the very words I have in the pending amendment, for a common carrier under the provisions of this act to do what? To engage in the business of mining, selling, and producing coal. That is simple, and I do not see how there can be any objection to this wording. It seems to me it is clear and to the point.

However, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] will, in due time, I believe, offer a substitute, when we will have an opportunity to further discuss the question. My aim and purpose is simply to correct evils and abuses that exist in the mining States and oppress the people. I did not, perhaps, understand the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] in regard to the development of the lumber interests of the State of North Carolina. If he advocated the right of an interstate railroad to engage in the business of manufacturing lumber as against local operators of lumber mills in that country, I think he is mistaken. That would be an abuse, and, inasmuch as it would give an advantage to the railroad company over the independent operator, it should be prohibited.

Railroads in recent years have been chartered and organized primarily for one purpose—namely, to transport freight and passengers. Nothing else. Fifty years ago I admit that the Reading, the Lehigh Valley, the Pennsylvania, and other roads, under special acts of the legislature, had the power conferred upon them of owning coal lands and mining and selling coal, which they have exercised for all these years. I do not want to interfere with these powers, but for the future I want it to be clearly understood that all interstate roads shall refrain from engaging in such business.

I do not know of any intrastate roads. There may exist in a State a road 50 or 100 or 200 miles long, but all these roads do interstate business, and doing that, it has been decided they become interstate carriers and interstate roads. I believe in confining strictly and positively railroads to doing two things—the transportation of freight and the transportation of passengers, and engaging in no other business of any kind whatsoever, directly or indirectly.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia whether, in his opinion, private car lines should not be prohibited from engaging in other business?

Mr. ELKINS. Private car lines?

Mr. FLINT. Yes, sir. They are now engaged in buying and selling fruit, and also in operating private car lines.

Mr. ELKINS. Yes. I believe every common carrier should be prohibited from doing any other business than that for which it was incorporated and organized.

Now, as to the question of the Senator from California, these private car lines are, I believe, organized to provide facilities for transporting fruit. But whether they are common carriers under the statute and from the standpoint I am discussing this question I do not know, and I do not wish that question to be involved in the discussion of my amendment.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

Mr. ELKINS. Allow me to say to the Senator from California that I lost my time yesterday by yielding and being graceful, and I do not want to be so unfortunate to-day.

Mr. FLINT. I want to ask the Senator from West Virginia one other question. In his opinion, should not the question as to private car lines engaged in business other than operating private car lines, and railroads engaged in business other than transporting freight and passengers, be left to a separate bill and this whole matter included in a bill other than the present bill? This is a very wide subject, and——

Mr. ELKINS. That is not a question. That is your opinion.

Mr. President, I know it is sought to sidetrack this amendment that corrects a great abuse and injustice. I know we are dealing with rates and trying to prohibit excessive rates, but there are abuses and evils produced by railroads far greater than excessive rates. The great evils and abuse are the kind I have mentioned. Rebates and discriminations are prohibited now by stringent laws. Now, another abuse by railroads is they refuse at times to give switches to shippers of interstate commerce. They will not give physical connection. If we are going to regulate railroads, if we are going to correct abuses, let us correct the real abuses that oppress the people and drive them out of business. What I complain of in this bill is that while it is a good bill as far as it goes, it does not go far enough. It does not correct the very abuse I am trying to bring to the attention of the Senate. It does not provide that where an interstate shipper is prepared to operate he shall have the right of switch connection. It does not provide that connecting lines shall have connections and fair, just, and reasonable prorating arrangements. Those are abuses of which the people of West Virginia complain, and they are evils which I should like to see corrected in this bill.

Mr. President, I think it is plain, in the words of the substitute offered by the Senator from North Dakota, that if common carriers are engaged in mining and selling coal or coke or other commodities along their lines in competition with shippers, it should be prohibited. That is a plain, simple proposition. It is an evil and an abuse, and if it is not checked it will enable the railroads of the country to absorb the mining business along their lines to any extent.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ELKINS. Some railroads now own forty or fifty or sixty thousand acres of coal lands. I am glad to see that lately the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company has determined—wisely, I think—to give up the business of mining and selling coal and engage only in the transportation of freight and passengers.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ELKINS. Just for a question.

Mr. FULTON. I observe that the Senator's proposition excludes from the operation of this amendment all railroads which by their charters are authorized to engage in mining coal.

Mr. ELKINS. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. I would ask the Senator what he means by their "charters?" Let him understand what I have in my mind. I call his attention to the fact that most of the railroads are organized under State laws, by which they can simply file articles of incorporation, setting forth the purpose for which they are organized and the business in which they propose to engage; and practically all of them propose to engage in business other than that simply of carriers. Does the Senator intend by his amendment to exclude from the operation of this law all railroads so organized and chartered?

Mr. ELKINS. I think under the general incorporation acts of the various State legislatures the power is only given to do the business of transporting freight and passengers, and no power is given under the general act to incorporate a railroad to buy and sell coal and engage in manufacturing.

Mr. FULTON. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that under many State laws a corporation may set out in its incorporation papers the purpose for which it is organized and the business in which it proposes to engage, and they include coal mining and various other pursuits in addition to mere transportation, in many instances.

Mr. ELKINS. I know that. I am perfectly familiar with that.

Mr. FULTON. The reason I state that to the Senator is this: His amendment will practically eliminate from the operation of the law he is seeking to have enacted every corporation whose articles of incorporation provide for engaging in business other than that of transportation.

Mr. ELKINS. No; I do not believe that——

Mr. FULTON. Therefore I suggest to the Senator the advisability of accepting the suggestion that this whole matter shall be treated in a separate bill.

Mr. ELKINS. I will answer your question. Under railroad charters taken out under the general incorporation acts of the States where extraordinary powers are attempted to be taken, I do not think the courts would hold that they can engage in anything but the transportation of freight and passengers.

In using the language or words "unless authorized by their charters" I meant only to protect the railroads chartered and organized fifty years ago under especial acts of the legislatures, and which have engaged in the business of mining and selling coal, and have bonds out on the coal property and improvements involving hundreds of millions of dollars. Perhaps it would not be right to disturb these vested rights. As to any future railroads I do not think that the Senator's question would apply at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair must inform the Senator from West Virginia that his time has expired.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am very much inclined to the opinion, as has been expressed by several Senators, that this is a matter we should not attempt to deal with in the pending bill. It is a bill to regulate railroads in the matter of transportation rates and fares for passenger transportation. It is an impossibility to make it a cure-all for all the evils which may exist in the operation of railroads. This is an extremely difficult question, and one in which almost certainly there is an evil which should be remedied by legislation, but it is one which affects so many interests that it is extremely important that whatever is done should be done with the utmost care.

I have in my hand the opinion of the court in the Chesapeake and Ohio case. I have not had the opportunity to give it the very careful examination which one ought to give to attempt to discuss it or to predicate an argument upon its rulings. I had only seen heretofore the newspaper accounts, and I have had an opportunity to look at this decision only this morning, since the Senate has been in session. As I understand, though, in the hasty examination which I have been able to give it, the particular point ruled by the court was this: It was charged that the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company sold and agreed to transport and deliver to the New York and New Haven Railroad Company coal at a rate which represented in the aggregate less than the cost of the coal and the rate of transportation as published by them as their regular rate, and that therefore it amounted to a system of rebates.

Mr. President, it will be seen how extremely difficult it will be to frame a law which shall correct that evil, because it relates not simply to a case where a railroad company buys property and where the market price in that way can be distinctly stated by being added to the transportation rate, and the proper aggregate can thus be ascertained, but it relates also to the case of a railroad that is producing property which it sells, and there comes in the difficulty of fixing what is the value of that property in such manner that it can be so added to the published rate as to indicate whether the railroad company is using it as a device for rebates.

That is an extremely difficult question, and it is one which not only will affect illegitimate enterprises, if I may so denominate them, but it is one which will affect legitimate enterprises, and therefore it should be regulated with great care, so as not in any manner to do unwanted injury to those legitimate enterprises.

I will give an illustration. Of course, in these matters the fact that it will affect industries in our particular localities naturally occurs to Senators. The Senator from Pennsylvania instanced the case of the lumber trade in North Carolina, and that is true also in the State of Georgia. The southern half of the State of Georgia is a timber-producing section. Very many railroads have been built in that section for no purpose except to develop the timber industry. Men owning large tracts of timber land remote from railroads have built railroads into those tracts of land for the purpose of being able to market the timber. After they have built the railroads, while they are engaged primarily and principally in the transportation of timber which they themselves cut, they also take some business from the public in the way of the carrying of passengers and freight, and however minor it may be compared with the main business of carrying the timber, it constitutes them as common carriers.

While it is true that those roads are located within the State entirely, beginning in the State and ending in the State, still when a railroad takes a shipment from a point within the State to a point out of the State, a part of the transportation to be effected through other carriers, it constitutes itself a corporation engaged in interstate commerce, and becomes subject to the provisions of this bill.

To say, as is proposed in the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will let me finish the sentence, to say, as is proposed by the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota, that no carrier engaged in interstate commerce, which these common carriers become, as I have just stated, shall be engaged in marketing or selling any coal, coke, or other commodity entering into interstate commerce, is to lay the hand of prohibition, so far as Congress has the power to do it, upon all of that industry. Now I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. I only wanted to inquire of the Senator whether or not, under the laws of the State of Georgia, railroads are incorporated with authority to engage in any other business than that of common carriers?

Mr. BACON. Ordinarily they are not, but there are instances, I think, in which they are. They are not incorporated by the legislature. We have a general railroad law which is sufficiently expansive, if I recall its provisions correctly, to permit a railroad company to engage in industries which immediately affect the purpose and business of the railroad.

Mr. FORAKER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that when the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad was incorporated, as stated by the Supreme Court decision to which the Senator has referred, there was no law of the State of Virginia prohibiting it from engaging in contracts of this kind. After that the State passed a law in 1895 prohibiting it, before this contract was entered into, and that cut a very important figure in the decision of the court.

Mr. BACON. But, if the Senator from Ohio will pardon me, if I have not incorrectly understood the decision, the main point in the case, as I gather it, is that the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company bought coal and agreed to deliver it to the New York and New Haven Railroad Company at a price which did not represent the cost of the coal and the transportation of the coal at the published rates of transportation, and that therefore the conclusion was irresistible, as stated by the court, that they had undertaken this transaction with a view to the transportation of the coal at less rates than they were charging to the general public, and at less rates than the published rates for transportation, and therefore it was a violation of the interstate-commerce law. It would have been a violation of interstate-commerce law, even conceding that the company did have the authority under its charter to engage in the business of buying and selling coal. That is a great question with which we have to deal.

It is not the fact, Mr. President, that the corporations are engaged simply in the business of buying and selling coal, but it is the fact that they are in a position to violate the interstate-commerce law in a way that makes it extremely difficult to determine that such violation has been accomplished, because in order to ascertain the fact it must be mathematically shown that the aggregate as represented in the original cost of the article and the cost of transportation does not equal the original cost of the article and the published rate of transportation added thereto.

Mr. President, I repeat, I simply give that by way of illustration. I shall myself, unless there is some modification, or unless something is said to change my mind upon the subject, vote against this amendment and against the general proposition as contained in all of these amendments, not wishing it to be understood that in so doing I am opposed to legislation on this subject. I think there ought to be legislation on the subject, because it is a tremendous evil for these transportation companies to be permitted to enter into competition directly with others engaged in similar business to that in which they are engaged outside of their distinct occupation as common carriers. I think it is a great evil, but I am unable in any proposition which has yet been suggested to see that the legislation proposed by those propositions can be safely entered upon without endangering some legitimate enterprises, while endeavoring to reach others we deem to be illegitimate.

Therefore, I hope that the matter may be so deferred that we may legislate upon it in another connection and at a time when we will be able to have the subject carefully examined into by a committee. While we have here the benefit of the investigation made by the Interstate Commerce Committee on the subject of the bill, I understand this particular question has not had a thorough examination at the hands of the committee. I will ask the Senator from South Carolina whether I am correct in that statement?

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will recall what is known as the "Tillman-Gillespie resolution," passed by the Senate some six or eight weeks ago, the Interstate Commerce Commission has been directed by a joint resolution of both Houses to investigate this question and it is now at work on it. It has not yet made any report.

Mr. BACON. That carries out the view which I had entertained that the matter has not been sufficiently investigated to enable Congress properly to legislate upon the subject. I think it is sufficiently great to be the subject of a separate and independent piece of legislation, and that it is too great to attempt to engraft it upon the pending bill with the imperfect investigation which has already been made.

I had more the purpose of giving my reasons why I may vote against it than the purpose of any general discussion. In the absence of modification by amendment I shall vote against it, I repeat, not because I desire that railroads shall have the opportunity to continue this kind of business, but because I think the legislation which is had upon it should be carefully considered and perfected, so that while illegitimate and improper practices may be condemned and prevented legitimate enterprises may not be interfered with and injured.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia has introduced a very important practical question, probably a more far-reaching and difficult question than any with which the pending bill undertakes to deal. The pending bill seeks to confine our labors to the abuses of the rate-making power. It has been said from time to time that there are enormous holes in the bill, but an examination shows that the holes through which cars and other vehicles are supposed to move easily are not in the bill but outside of it, and arise from the fact that the bill does not undertake to do everything.

No more difficult railway proposition exists than this connection of the carriers with the productive enterprises of the country. That relation is in all forms. Some railroads own coal mines and undertake to engage in the distribution of coal, and curiously enough some coal mines own railroads, because it has become a favorite method in these days in organizing a coal corporation to anticipate in a way the probable attitude of Congress, and the public dreads a mixture of the two functions. So it is not uncommon to find great coal corporations having as a part of their charter rights the right to build and operate railroads.

Now, the question is so difficult, it involves so many questions of constitutional construction, that if I can get the attention of the Senator from West Virginia I want to make a suggestion. I think these amendments ought to be disagreed to, but it ought to be done with a distinct understanding that Congress will immediately undertake to deal with the problems involved in the questions the honorable Senator from West Virginia has suggested. We have already investigations ordered by Congress that will be fruitful, I think, in information in respect to these questions, and I am strongly of the opinion that it would be an act of folly to undertake to deal offhand with such problems as the Senator from West Virginia has so ably stated in the Senate.

I suggest, therefore, that these amendments be disagreed to, and that the Senator introduce as soon as may be a bill, because no one is more familiar than he is with the practical aspects of the question, and have it referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce; and I feel certain that before the end of the session a well-matured measure, squared to the practical questions involved and squared as far as he may be able to do so to the legal questions involved, can be presented to the Senate and passed. I believe that treatment of the question would be infinitely better than an offhand undertaking to deal with it here.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. Do I understand the Senator to make a motion to refer the amendment I offered as well as the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have made no motion, because I am advised that such a proceeding is at least questionable, if not irregular. I have suggested, however, that the Senator yield a mild acquiescence in the action which I propose, to dispose of these amendments with a common understanding that the nature of these problems is appreciated by the Senate, and that the Senate can deal with them and kindred problems in a separate measure.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, appreciating the difficulty surrounding the Senate in regard to this matter, which is practically a new matter before the Senate, I would move, if in order, that all these amendments be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, with instructions to report a bill to the Senate at as early a moment as practicable.

Mr. ELKINS. What amendment? This amendment?

Mr. OVERMAN. Your amendment and the amendments incident to your amendment.

Mr. ELKINS. Yes; the substitute.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will leave the question to the Senate to decide for itself whether or not the motion is in order. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and all amendments incident thereto be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce with instructions to report a bill to the Senate at as early a date as practicable.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement is that motion in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair leaves the question as to whether the motion is in order to the Senate to determine for itself.

Mr. KEAN. Let the unanimous-consent agreement be read, Mr. President

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Friday, May 4, 1906, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 12987, "'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission;" the bill to be read by sections for the purpose of amendment, the discussion upon amendments offered to proceed under a fifteen-minute rule, the amendments to be disposed of when the discussion thereon is concluded.

Mr. KEAN. I can not see anything except a violation of that agreement in the motion, and therefore I do not think the motion is in order.

Mr. FRYE. Does it not dispose of an amendment if it is referred to a committee?

Mr. CULLOM. Of course.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. KEAN. With instructions to report?

Mr. FRYE. Yes; with instructions to report.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I rather think——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. CULLOM. I did not rise to this question. I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. McLAURIN. I merely rose to suggest that the unanimous-consent rule itself can be changed by unanimous consent, and if the Senator from North Carolina would change his motion to a request for unanimous consent that the amendments be referred it might be done in that way.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is not necessary. It is one disposition of the amendments to refer them back to the committee.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

Mr. McLAURIN. I merely made the suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. DANIEL. I understand the Senator from Illinois desires to offer an amendment, and out of courtesy to him I yield.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, we expected the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to be present here to-day and offer an amendment to the pending bill. We are told that he is not quite so well this afternoon as he was this morning, and he sends me word that he desires that I shall offer an amendment to the bill in his behalf. I take very great pleasure in doing that, but greatly regret that he is not here to offer it himself. I desire to offer it.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator offer an amendment now or submit it as a proposed amendment?

Mr. CULLOM. I simply offer the amendment to be printed and go over, hoping that the Senator from Iowa will be here to-morrow or very soon to take charge of the amendment himself.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment presented by the Senator from Illinois on behalf of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. FRYE. Let the amendment, please, be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment at the request of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. RAYNER. As I desire to offer an amendment to that amendment, may I send it to the table and have it read in connection with the amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It may be read following the amendment proposed on behalf of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. RAYNER. I will then send up the amendment to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. After the Secretary has finished the reading of the amendment presented by the Senator from Illinois the amendment of the Senator from Maryland will be read.

Mr. RAYNER. It comes in after the word "courts" in the present amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment presented by the Senator from Illinois on behalf of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The SECRETARY. On page 10, lines 20 and 21, strike out the words "and fairly remunerative."

On page 11, line 5, after the word "prescribed," strike out the remainder of said line and down to and including the word "carrier," in line 7, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

All orders of the Commission, except orders for the payment of money, shall take effect within such reasonable time and shall continue in force for such period of time, not exceeding two years, as shall be prescribed in the order of the Commission.

On page 14, line 20, after the word "proper," insert a period and strike out the remainder of line 20 down to and including the word "effect," on page 15, line 2.

On page 17, line 11, after the words "United States," insert the words "against the Commission."

On page 17, line 14, after the word "office," insert the following:

And if the order or requirement has been made against two or more carriers then in the district where any one of said carriers has its principal operating office, and if the carrier has its principal operating office in the District of Columbia, then the venue shall be in the district where said carrier has its principal office, and jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits is hereby vested in such courts.

On page 17, line 18, after the word "suits," insert the following: "including the hearing on an application for a preliminary injunction."

On page 18, line 6, after the word "causes," add the following proviso:

Provided, That no injunction, interlocutory order, or decree suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the Commission shall be granted except on hearing after not less than five days' notice to the Commission. An appeal may be taken from any interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing an injunction in any suit, but shall lie only to the Supreme Court of the United States: Provided further, That the appeal must be taken within thirty days from the entry of such order or decree, and it shall take precedence in the appellate court over all other causes except causes of like character and criminal causes.

On page 19, line 22, after the word "order," strike out all of the remainder of the section.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I suggest that we have a reprint of the bill with these amendments inserted in their proper places in italics.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Secretary will now read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] to the amendment just read.

Mr. BACON. I did not understand the Senator from Rhode Island. Does the Senator ask for a reprint of the bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. For a reprint of the bill with the amendments just read inserted in italics, in order to see the precise effect.

Mr. BACON. There are other amendments.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I object to the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island. The proposed amendment is merely the individual proposition of a Senator and not that of a committee. I see no reason why those amendments should be printed in the bill and others not, and I object to the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. ALDRICH. The purpose of my suggestion must be perfectly apparent to the Senate. It is that we may have a better understanding of the effect of the amendments. It was not for any other purpose. I certainly had no ulterior purpose in making the suggestion.

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly; I understand that, Mr. President.

Mr. ALDRICH. And I have never known a request of that kind to be denied before in the Senate. It is simply made for the convenience of Senators.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have been in the Senate a very short time in comparison with the Senator from Rhode Island, but I have never known before of a suggestion being made that a proposition of a single Senator should be printed in italics with the bill itself.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to all the other amendments being printed in that way.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will object to that as I would to the individual proposition of a Senator being so printed. If this were an amendment proposed by the Committee on Interstate Commerce it would be an entirely different proposition, and I would have no objection.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then, I make the request that the sections which are proposed to be amended by these amendments may be printed for the use of the Senate with the amendments suggested in italics, that we may understand their full purport.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island as modified?

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the Senator state it again?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is that the sections of the bill as proposed to be amended by the suggested amendment may be printed separately.

Mr. CULBERSON. Separately from the bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. Separately from the bill; for the use of the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have no objection to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the request of the Senator from Rhode Island to embrace the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and also the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to that, although my request was for the printing of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will now read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

The SECRETARY. To the amendment on page 17, line 14, after the word "office," it is proposed to insert certain words, and then, after the words "vested in such court," it is proposed to insert the following:

But such jurisdiction shall not attach upon the bill or petition of a carrier for the purpose of enjoining, setting aside, annulling, or suspending any order or requirement of the Commission, unless the carrier alleges in its bill or petition that its property has been taken in violation of the fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, or that the Commission has exceeded the jurisdiction conferred upon it by law, and in the hearing and determination of such suit the court shall be limited to said allegations so set forth in said bill or petition.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the amendment just read is to be printed with the other amendment it ought to be printed in different type, so that we may understand which is which.

Mr. RAYNER. I have no objection to its being printed in different type, but I should like it printed with the other amendment. We might distinguish the two by calling the first amendment "the President's amendment."

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I think we ought to have those amendments sent to the Public Printer and printed at once. We have been in the habit of doing that, and we can get the amendments back here in a couple of hours. They are important amendments, and from the present outlook it is essential that they should be printed at once. I should think we ought to have them returned from the Printer this afternoon.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, the only object which can possibly be desired in connection with the printing of the amendment which I have had the honor to offer in behalf of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is so that we may understand what it means, where it belongs, and what connection it has with the bill as it now stands. The Senate will observe, or doubtless did observe in the reading of the amendment which I offered, that it refers to many places and many paragraphs in the bill, and consists of different items, so that reading the amendment alone, without having the bill to make comparisons and see where the amendment comes in, would be utterly useless, because one would not know what it meant. To avoid that difficulty was, therefore, the only purpose which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] had in view, and it was for that which he desired the amendment printed in such a way as the Senate would understand exactly its relation to the bill as it now stands.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the suggestion which I have made, and which I understand has been adopted, will answer all the requirements of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; I think so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] requests that the amendments proposed which have just been stated, one having been offered on behalf of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and the other having been offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], be printed in connection with the sections of the bill to which they are respectively directed. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] requests that such printing be done immediately, and, in the absence of objection, the Chair will request that that also be done.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope that both the first and last editions of the amendment offered on behalf of the Senator from Iowa will be printed. I know as now offered it is an enlarged edition.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, has the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] been disposed of?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not been. The motion now pending before the Senate is the one made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

Mr. KEAN. Let it be reported, Mr. President.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. DANIEL. I did not mean to interrupt the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], who, I understand, simply rose to make an inquiry.

Mr. KEAN. Certainly, I yield. I only wanted to have the pending amendment disposed of, so that we might get along with the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, we have an opportunity at this time to greatly improve this bill, an opportunity to correct some of the evils that exist in the interstate commerce of this country.

I seriously doubt, Mr. President, if the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is in order, if it be so comprehensive as it seems to me on the one hearing of it which I have had. I suppose that it relates simply to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and to the substitute offered therefor by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN], though it sounded to me, and I think was expressed in still broader terms, to refer all of the amendments which have been offered on this subject to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I would ask that it may be read as it was taken down, so that I may apprehend exactly what is the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Reporter who took the notes at that time has retired to the Reporters' room, and the Chair will send for the transcript of the notes.

Mr. DANIEL. While waiting for that, Mr. President, I will say that I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] that we should not be hasty in adopting any amendment on this subject. It is a very grave matter to interfere with any existing order of things. At the same time, if the existing order of things be productive of mischief and of disadvantage to the general public, it ought to be corrected; and the opportunity is now. When this opportunity may come again, no man can say.

It is difficult to effect the concentration of the attention of both branches of Congress upon any subject. The attention of one branch of Congress has been fixed to this subject, and the fruit of its action is before us. We have an opportunity now, which we may never see again for a long, long time, to mature a measure for the general advantage of the people of the United States, and this fugitive opportunity should not be abandoned.

I am one of those, Mr. President, who think that the President of the United States acted wisely in bringing this vast subject to the attention of Congress. There are many things in which I differ from him; but, Mr. President, when I do agree with any public man who is in high and responsible position there is no reason why I should not express that opinion and applaud such action as, in my judgment, tends to the general public weal. I may not agree in all that he has done about it.

We seldom agree altogether with any other human being, such is the diversity and idiosyncrasy of the human mind; but this was a subject, Mr. President, which had arisen in the public mind, one in which the public made just complaint, one in which the party to which I have the honor to belong had called the attention of the public, and one which the party to which the President belongs had absolutely ignored in all of its public utterances. It took courage on the part of the President to bring this matter to the attention of the people of the United States as he did; and for his courage and for his wisdom in that regard I do applaud him, without saying that I agree in all the operations of his mind upon this subject.

One of the impediments to fair commercial intercourse between the different trading communities of the United States is the engaging by common carriers in the carriage of great masses of produce, not for the public benefit, but for their own behoof and advantage. This is a thing which Congress should be disposed to stop as rapidly as it reasonably can; and the opportunity is now.

There is nothing in the history of any rate bill or of any railroad legislation in this body to especially stimulate the hope that we will be nearer a solution of this problem by referring it to the Interstate Commerce Committee of this body. That committee consists of an able body of men. It can at least be said of them that they have been very patient in their deliberations and that they have not laid before the Senate as yet any full and complete report of the operations of their minds upon this subject such as its gravity and dignity seem to call for; neither has that committee indicated any disposition to speed any bill which has been referred to it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DANIEL. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was about to suggest to the Senator from Virginia that this specific subject has never been referred to that committee and has never been before them officially.

Mr. DANIEL. That is true, Mr. President; but when the committee has been occupied for a year or more in investigating all of the questions which arise in interstate commerce, it would not have been impertinent to this subject if the committee had itself suggested an amendment.

I am not intending, Mr. President, to make any severe criticism on that committee. I know the difficulties which environ them and I am slow to censure any of my colleagues, as those who are not aware of their difficulties and environments might do; but I simply say that if these amendments be so referred and shall not move faster than other measures have moved, the Senator will be an older and wiser man when he sees the solution of this problem than he is now.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. DANIEL. With pleasure.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], one of the leaders on the other side of the Chamber, rose in his place and asked the Senate to disagree to those amendments. After he had made that speech I preferred, rather than have those amendments voted down, that we send them to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, with the instruction of this body to report a bill carrying out the Senator's ideas at the earliest practicable moment. I want to say that I indorse what he says as to the necessity for this legislation, and I heartily approve of it.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator could add to his resolution an assurance that that bill would get the attention of both Houses of Congress within any reasonable time, I might appreciate its force more than I do under existing and well-known conditions.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DANIEL. With pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. I happened to be out of the Chamber when the motion was made by the Senator from North Carolina. Do I understand him now to say that the committee is to be instructed to report a bill in accordance with the wishes of the Senator from Virginia? Is that the motion?

Mr. OVERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the statement made by the Senator from North Carolina, and so long as I was not advised as to what the views of the Senator from Virginia are, I did not know how such a motion could very well be made.

Mr. OVERMAN. I only spoke as to my own personal views on the subject, that the committee should be instructed to report a bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. You were not indorsing the views of the Senator from Virginia in instructing the committee?

Mr. OVERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, if that committee should report here a bill, who knows that it would ever be heard of? If a bill on this subject separate and to itself is reported to this body, who can give any assurance that it will ever get the attention of both branches of Congress? We have here a great measure on this subject, and it is at a time when the minds of this body are addressed to the study of the questions involved in that bill and all connate questions; and now, Mr. President, I repeat, is the opportunity for those who desire some remedies to be perfected and embodied in this measure to debate questions as they arise and to invite action thereupon. I do not know that any of these amendments will be voted down. I have not heard sufficient expression of opinion on that subject to form any judgment thereupon. We can not tell until the sense of this Chamber is taken, and we can only acquire that sense by debating the matter and by laying before our colleagues the considerations pro and con.

Now, Mr. President, I shall address myself briefly to the consideration of these amendments as they now stand. I do not think the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] takes hold of this case by the right handle, and I do not think that any amendment which seeks to interdict the competition of carriers themselves with their customers ought to be involved with any other question that can be avoided. If there is a clear conception to subserve, put that conception separate to itself and let it stand on its own merits, without involving other questions which are not essential to the main issue.

I think, Mr. President, and with diffidence and deference I submit that the following amendment, which I had the honor to prepare and sent up to the Secretary's table on yesterday afternoon, will reach the main gravamen of the complaints of the people which have been so numerous. For the words used in the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia I would substitute the following:

It shall be unlawful for any common carrier to transport from one State, Territory, or District of the United States to another State, Territory, or District of the United States or to any foreign country any article or commodity whatever which may be owned by it or in which it has any interest, excepting such as are necessary for its own use in its business as a carrier and not intended for sale, barter, or commercial traffic of any sort.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is obliged to inform the Senator that his fifteen minutes have expired.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the Senator will find that the amendment which I offered this morning covers the same subject in very much fewer words and will reach everything that he seeks to reach.

I only desire now to call attention to the proposition that was made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. I believe the Senator from Pennsylvania in his very brief remarks challenged the authority of Congress, under the constitutional provision allowing Congress to regulate interstate commerce, to so regulate it as to interfere with the sale of any products lawfully accumulated in any State by any common carrier and transmitted to another State for sale. As an illustration, the Senator referred to the production of lumber by a railway company in the State of South Carolina, to be sold outside of the State of South Carolina, and, if I understood his position correctly, it was to the effect that Congress had no such power.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. With this important qualification, that the commerce as carried on shall be conducted under such circumstances as to do no injustice or injury to anyone else conducting the same business—in other words, that the power of Congress over the subject rests upon the right to regulate transportation between the States, and in the regulation of transportation between the States it may prescribe the rules by which that transportation is to be conducted, and among other rules that it may prescribe is the rule of freedom of competition and the rule of nondiscrimination. In the case of a carrier lawfully engaged under the laws of the State that chartered it, notwithstanding the charter of the State and notwithstanding its dealing with the products of the State, taken from the soil of the State, Congress could prohibit it from entering the channels of interstate trade if in the carrying on of that interstate trade it under any arrangement had an unlawful advantage over any of its competitors. That is the position I sought to make clear this morning. That is as far as I went.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thoroughly agree with that proposition, Mr. President, but I can not understand how it is possible for a railroad company mining its own coal and shipping it absolutely free, without any charge whatever—of course, it could not charge itself for moving its own products—can enter into the markets of another State on equal grounds with other producers of coal, whether in the other State or in the State from which the coal is transported. The very fact that it gets practically free transportation places it in a position where it has the power to sell cheaper than other producers, so that in the sale of its products it is not meeting its competitors upon equal grounds.

It clearly seems to me that Congress has power, under its authority to regulate commerce, to provide that no such advantage shall be held by the common carriers against their competitors. If that is true, then, under the illustration that was given by the Senator from Pennsylvania in the case from South Carolina, it would seem clear that the Congress could interdict the corporation created in the State from selling outside of the State or dealing in commodities of that character.

The Senator gave, as another illustration, the case referring to lottery tickets. Of course, that case was decided principally upon the ground that lottery tickets themselves are not the subject of commerce; they are not a lawful product of any State; but, on the contrary, are unlawful. As against that, however, I call attention to the act of Congress to cure a defect in the law that was demonstrated in the Iowa liquor cases. The production of beer by the breweries in any State is considered at all times to be a perfectly legitimate business. Under the laws of the State of Iowa it was attempted to apply the local law as soon as the product should arrive in the State. As the Federal law then stood, it was held by the Supreme Court that the local laws of the State of Iowa could not operate upon the articles in original unbroken packages. Until the packages had been broken and the articles were distributed, they were subjects of interstate commerce. Congress passed a law to remedy that; and in that law it was provided simply that the moment any of these articles of interstate commerce—legal and proper articles in the State in which they were produced—entered into another State, they should immediately become subject to the police power of that State. So that, while the articles produced may be subjects of interstate commerce and while the laws of the State make them legally subjects of commerce, it seems to me clear, from that case, that Congress may step in and, under its authority to regulate commerce, may determine whether or not the corporation may deal in those particular articles as articles of interstate commerce.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator contend that there is no limitation upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think that Congress can so regulate commerce as to destroy property rights, for instance, entirely under the authority to regulate. There are quite a number of limitations. Regulation does not carry with it, in my opinion, the power absolutely to destroy.

Mr. KNOX. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Does the Senator believe that Congress can regulate commerce in such a way as to regulate production within the borders of the States?

Mr. McCUMBER. It does indirectly in many ways.

Mr. KNOX. I admit it can indirectly.

Mr. McCUMBER. We can pass no direct law the effect of which would be to limit the production in the State; but a law of this kind certainly would not directly limit it. It simply regulates; and that regulation may indirectly limit the production.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me again?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think, then, that it is within the constitutional capacity of Congress to prohibit any manufacturing company or producer in a State from shipping its product from State to State without first getting a license from the Government of the United States?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is a very far-fetched question, it seems to me, as affecting this case.

Mr. SPOONER. What I want to get at is the limit, if there is one, to the power of Congress to regulate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think that the power of Congress to regulate would include the power to prohibit the introduction from one State to another of goods that could legitimately be carried from one State to another—if that is what the Senator means. That would not be a regulation whatever.

Mr. President, I simply desire to say one word in reference to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia. I think the substitute could be well adopted. It is clear and to the point, and, under the suggestion made by the Senator from New Jersey, it might be amended, if it is to be adopted, by inserting the time at which it shall take effect. If any danger should arise because of these companies having a large amount of coal or other products on hand, dealing in which the amendment prohibits, we could fix some future time at which the amendment should take effect.

Mr. SPOONER obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am in favor of legislation to remedy the evils denounced by the several amendments of the Senators from West Virginia, North Dakota, and Mississippi. But, Mr. President, it seems to me obvious that the Senate is not in possession of sufficient information upon this subject to enable us to wisely and safely legislate.

For more than two years the attention of the country and of the Senate has been focused upon the great question of rate legislation. During the past summer a committee of this body sat almost continuously, making investigations and gathering facts upon which to predicate legislation. For more than two months now this body has been discussing this great question. Senators are in possession of the great mass of information gathered by the committee. For months they have been studying the many and complex questions of law involved. Notwithstanding all of this investigation and study, we find ourselves, with respect to some features of the pending measure, troubled with perplexing doubts and divided views.

Now, suddenly there is injected into this legislation another question. If not equally as important, if not equally as far-reaching, certainly it is a big question and one which requires investigation and consideration for safe and wise solution. Only a few days ago the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] for the first time brought this question before the Senate in a definite form. I think the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] stated, and stated correctly, that it has never yet been considered by any committee of this body. I repeat, the subject covered by these amendments is a big question, a question with many ramifications, and if we should to-day incorporate in this measure some hasty and ill-advised provisions upon this subject, we would be in danger in attempting to remedy one wrong of doing another wrong.

Who is prepared to say, upon the hasty consideration we have given this subject to-day, operating as we are under the fifteen-minute rule, without adequate data and information as to its effects upon the many and varied interests concerned, what would be the effect upon these interests in this country of the adoption of either one of the amendments proposed by the Senators? If we should adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia, I fear the effect would be to greatly embarrass and cripple certain important enterprises in my State.

Mr. DANIEL. What industry is that?

Mr. SIMMONS. Railroad building and the manufacture of lumber. There is, as I will show later, a very important connection between these in my State at this time.

I have no doubt that there are great evils growing out of the conditions which exist in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and West Virginia by reason of the fact that some of the railroads in those States are also the owners of many of the coal mines and that they are operated conjointly. There is a just and powerful public sentiment that these evils should be remedied. But there is, I think, no demand for hasty or immature legislation.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has alluded to the conditions in my State. I do not refer to them for the purpose of using them as an argument against the proposed amendments, but for the purpose of showing what might be the effect upon these conditions if the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia, for instance, should be adopted. There is to-day in my State an era of railroad construction. That is especially true in the eastern section of the State, in the great pine-tree region of the State. Nearly every railroad that is to-day in process of construction in that section of the State is being built by corporations that are interested in the manufacture of lumber. They have bought immense tracts of timber land; they have built great plants upon those lands, and they are now constructing railroads to and through them. Nearly every one of these railroads has its basing point outside of the State of North Carolina. The timber does not lie upon streams. The most of that has long since been cut. The timber that remains is in the interior, so to speak. It can only be reached by railroads. In some instances the railroad would be worth but little without the timber, and the timber but little without the railroad. There are at least 200 miles of railroad being constructed in my State to-day, much of it to develop timber lands owned by those who are building them, and the market for all of that timber is outside of the State, making this interstate business.

Mr. President, I am in favor of effective legislation by which the evil aimed at by the amendments can be reached. The evil is so great that I am free to say here to-day if it becomes necessary to destroy connections, such as I have spoken of as existing in my State, I am ready, if necessary, to destroy those connections and divorce these other interests, however embarrassing and repressive may be the consequences, in order that the people may have relief from the discrimination and oppressions of monopoly.

But we have had this subject before us for only a short time; it was injected here only yesterday evening as a proposed amendment to this bill, and I submit that we are not in a condition to take final action to-day upon this question. I want it understood that, if necessary, I am willing to go as far as any other Senator upon this floor to accomplish the end and result these amendments have in view. The question I wish to raise is whether we are ready and prepared at this time to legislate, and whether, if we shall proceed hastily and without fuller discussion and consideration, we are not in danger of making a mistake and of injuring interests that might be protected and yet the people given the relief which they demand and to which they are entitled.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I would regard it as an unmixed misfortune for the Senate to recommit this matter to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. If it should take that committee—and I mean no reflection on it—as long to report a bill on this subject as it did to report the bill upon the main subject, the people would lose heart before the Congress could take action. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] suggests that this question is as important as the main question, and measuring it by its importance we might expect an almost interminable delay.

I know there is no Senator in this body more earnestly in favor of efficient and prompt action upon this subject than the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] who made this motion. But I sincerely hope he will be convinced that if this matter goes back to the committee it may not be brought into the Senate, as already suggested, until the next session, and the next session, being a short one, is apt to adjourn without any relief being afforded to the people from these very oppressive and indefensible practices.

I believe, Mr. President, that in the history of legislation no greater good was ever sought to be accomplished than the good which will be accomplished by the less than eight lines of this amendment. As I understand, the Senator from West Virginia, accepting the suggestion that was made to him yesterday, has provided that this prohibition shall rest against the carrier from engaging in interstate commerce when he engages in these prohibited transactions. With that correction, I do not myself feel the least doubt as to the constitutionality of the provision. We are not required to defend a total prohibition of commerce under this amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. Which is that?

Mr. BAILEY. This is the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] as amended by the Senator from Minnesota. This is only a regulation of interstate commerce. The carrier can relieve itself from the prohibition by simply conforming to what every man admits to be a wholesome public policy. In the Lottery case, to which I referred yesterday, it was an absolute, total prohibition against interstate commerce in that article. Here the prohibition rests only against a carrier who does certain forbidden things, and that carrier relieves himself of the prohibition and resumes his normal and proper business of transporting goods from State to State whenever he surrenders the doing of that which it is not the business of any common carrier to do.

If you take the sense of the Senate, I do not believe there is a single Senator who will write in the RECORD—and they would not be afraid to record it there if it was their judgment—as his deliberate judgment that a common carrier ought to engage in business except that for which a common carrier is intended. A common carrier is given great rights and privileges; it exercises a power and a faculty of government; it appropriates to its use a citizen's property; and no person, natural or artificial, who exercises a faculty and a power like that ought to be permitted to engage in the ordinary vocations of life.

We must take the common carrier and segregate him from the balance of the community. We must recognize that rules and limitations apply to him which apply to no other citizen or corporation, and we can never properly deal with this question unless we keep that steadily and always in our mind.

With a Senate that is practically unanimous in favor of excluding a carrier who exercises the privileges and seeks the profits of a merchant, manufacturer, or a miner from interstate commerce, it looks to me like there is wisdom enough in the Senate to draft in its open session a provision to carry that deliberate and unanimous judgment into effect. For my part I am willing to go on record that the amendment now pending is sufficient to accomplish its object. If it be not, then, when this bill goes to a conference committee, it being a matter in controversy between the two Houses, the conference committee, in the quiet of its room and at such leisure as both Houses will cheerfully accord it, can prepare this provision so that it will be clear, so that it will be constitutional, and so that it will be effective.

I would regard it as an admission of incompetence on the part of the Senate for us to say that though we all agree a given thing ought to be done, we are unable to do it for ourselves, and we, therefore refer it back to a committee for their long and patient consideration. I sincerely hope that the Senate will deal with this question now, deal with it for itself, and deal with it in a fashion that no common carrier will ever again attempt to engage in any business except its proper and legitimate one.

I would suggest, Mr. President, and then I will yield, that it might be fair and just, in order to give the common carriers an opportunity and time to adjust themselves to this new and proper condition, that the amendment should take effect on the 1st day of January, 1908. I hardly think a common carrier could ask time in order that he might quit doing what he ought never to have done in the first place; but in dealing with it as a condition, I am willing to afford them a reasonable time in which to dispose of their improper and illegal possessions, and in order that there may be no serious interruption of interstate transportation and travel, I will vote for that kind of a provision.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas whether it would not be possible to include with the proposition which he now suggests this, in addition, that in the meantime they shall not go on acquiring coal lands and oil lands?

I noted but a few days ago that one of the railroads in the southwestern part of this country had invested some $15,000,000 in coal lands in New Mexico. If we are to wait for legislation to become operative, I suggest we ought to find some means to put the bars up against corporations acquiring vast holdings of coal and oil lands and other products that they are to transport.

Mr. BAILEY. I thoroughly agree with the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin, and if it is believed that the knowledge that they can not hold such property will not prevent them from acquiring it between the passage of this law and the time when the provision shall take effect it would undoubtedly be right to include such a provision as the Senator from Wisconsin has suggested.

My own idea was that if you provided expressly that after the 1st of January, 1908, they should not be permitted to engage in interstate commerce if they also engaged in the prohibited industries, that itself would be sufficient to restrain them. But surely the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin can do no harm, and it might do good. Therefore I should be very willing to support it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I shall not allow myself to be put in the position of delaying this matter. If there is so much distrust of the committee itself and there is such doubt expressed as to whether or not we will have a report from that committee, I will withdraw my motion.

I made the motion, sir, because I knew that the Senate had passed a joint resolution instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies in coal and oil, and report on the same from time to time. I wish to read from the joint resolution:

> Fifth. That said Commission be also required to investigate and report the system of car supply and distribution in effect upon the several railway lines engaged in the transportation of coal or oil as aforesaid, and whether said systems are fair and equitable, and whether the same are carried out fairly and properly; and whether said carriers, or any of them, discriminate against shippers or parties wishing to become shippers over their several lines, either in the matter of distribution of cars or in furnishing facilities or instrumentalities connected with receiving, forwarding, or carrying coal or oil as aforesaid.
> Sixth. That said Commission be also required to report as to what remedy it can suggest to cure the evils above set forth, if they exist.
> Seventh. That said Commission be also required to report any facts or conclusions which it may think pertinent to the general inquiry above set forth.

I knew that the Commission had been investigating these matters; I knew they had the testimony before them, and following the Senator from Iowa, the author of this bill and the leader, when he asked the Senate to disagree to the amendments, I thought it better, sir, to have this matter referred back to the committee, with instructions to report forthwith upon this subject, and give us a bill that was sensible and wise and would destroy no property and would give the relief that the people seek. But since so much doubt has been expressed that there will be delay and that we will not get the report even at the next session, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BAILEY. I am gratified that the Senator from North Carolina refuses to allow a motion of his to be used for the purpose of delay. I am sure that that Senator knows that I would be the last man in this body to believe that he would intend anything of the kind. I know him well enough to know that his purpose is to deal with everything in the open. I know that his purpose is to protect the people.

No provision, in my judgment, touching the regulation of commerce is more important than this. If we could adopt an amendment which would keep the rates established by the Commission in effect until the final judgment of the court, and if we could divorce the business of transportation from the business of production and distribution, we would earn the gratitude of this country for a thousand years to come. If we can not do both, let us at least do one, and if we do neither, the people of this country will, and the people of this country ought to, settle with us for our failure to do that which plainly we ought to do.

Mr. DRYDEN. Mr. President, I am very glad to know that the Senator from Texas agrees with the principle of a suggested amendment which I mentioned this morning, and I have no criticism to make upon what the Senator says upon that point except that in my judgment the time proposed by him——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests to the Senator from New Jersey that he understands that the Senator has already spoken once upon this subject, and, if the Chair is correct——

Mr. DRYDEN. I am going to offer an amendment. I offer the amendment now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's amendment would not be in order now, the question being on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. DRYDEN. Can I submit an amendment to lie upon the table until it can properly be acted upon?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator can do that.

Mr. DRYDEN. I will ask, then, whether, if the substitute of the Senator from North Dakota is adopted in lieu of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota so adopted would then be open to amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would prefer to decide that question when it properly arises.

Mr. DRYDEN. It is a very important matter for me, Mr. President, to know whether I shall be in a position to offer an amendment later on or not. May I ask what is the real question now before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi in the nature of a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. SCOTT. Let us have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the junior Senator from West Virginia, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi will be again read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] insert:

It shall be unlawful for any corporation that mines or manufactures or produces any article or commodity of commerce for sale to engage in the business of interstate commerce as a carrier of any of its own products, mining, or manufacture; and it shall be unlawful for such corporation to charge, demand, collect, or receive any money or other thing for the carriage, as a carrier of interstate commerce, of any of the like kind of articles or commodities produced, mined, or manufactured by any other person, company, or corporation, and for a violation of this provision the person paying such charge or demand may recover in any State or Federal court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter an amount triple the amount so collected or paid, together with all costs of collection, including attorney's fees and costs of travel to and from and attendance upon court. If any such corporation shall engage in the business of a carrier of such articles or commodities as intrastate carrier it shall be unlawful for such corporation to engage in interstate commerce as a carrier of any kind of commerce.

Mr. DRYDEN. Mr. President, when I addressed the Senate before it was my intention to speak, and I supposed I was speaking, to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia. I did not intend to speak to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would ask the Senator from New Jersey if his amendment, which has not been reported, and which he contemplates introducing, is an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, as modified?

Mr. DRYDEN. I understand the amendment which I propose at the proper time to offer would at this time be out of order, as there is an amendment to an amendment now pending before the Senate, and therefore it would not be parliamentary for me now to offer another amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know the character of the amendment proposed by the Senator or the particular subject to which it is addressed, and therefore he inquires for information.

Mr. FORAKER. As I understand it, the Senator spoke before the amendment was offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If so——

Mr. FORAKER. And he spoke only to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia. It is his clear right to speak to the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If so, the Senator would clearly be in order on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. DRYDEN. That was my position, as I understood it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator is entirely in order.

Mr. DRYDEN. I am sorry I have already consumed a good deal more of the time of the Senate in trying to ascertain my position than I shall now consume in stating it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time so consumed will not count against the Senator.

Mr. DRYDEN. Mr. President, the principle involved in the remarks of the Senator from Texas, which I very briefly outlined this morning in a few remarks of my own, I think are most important, and it is of the greatest necessity to incorporate it in this amendment if it is to pass the Senate.

Senators, consider for a moment the situation. Here are these great coal-carrying companies supplying 80,000,000 people with the products of their mines. They furnish what to-day is the only facility for getting this necessary product to market. Their arrangement, whether by ownership, by leasing these properties, or by any other contract, is such that the properties to a very large extent are under the control of these companies.

Now it is proposed, as the amendment now stands, to wrench the management and control of the properties furnishing this great necessity suddenly out of their places, and what disposition is it proposed to make of them?

Is there a single line in the amendment which has been proposed here, or in any one of the amendments which have been proposed as substitutes, that deals with this important phase of the question? Who is going to mine the coal owned now by these great railroad companies? Who is going to carry it to market? When the people want coal, of whom are they to get it? Is there any proposition for supplying them? I have heard none. I have not heard any even intimated in the discussions here. Yet without warning, without a single hour in which to readjust these momentous matters, it is proposed to legislate here and to revolutionize one of the greatest interests and one of the most important lines of business in this country.

I say to Senators a step like this would be fatal to the American people, and it would bring on this country a calamity which has never been paralleled in our whole history. I ask Senators to pause in the face of this tremendous matter and give it due consideration. I propose for the consideration of the Senate an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia. I understand that it can not be formally received now, but I ask that it may lie upon the table. I wish the Secretary to take it down:

That on and after July 1, in the year 1911.

It comes in previous to the beginning of the proposed amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, and I am sure that even a most superficial consideration of this great matter will cause Senators to pause and give due weight to its importance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from New Jersey that his amendment as now stated by him is in the direction of perfecting the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, and is therefore perfectly in order. The amendment in the nature of a substitute can only be in order after the original amendment of the Senator from West Virginia is perfected. The question, therefore, is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. DRYDEN. I thank the President of the Senate, and am glad to know the amendment is in order now.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from New Jersey, before he resumes his seat, permit me to answer a question he asked and which I did not interrupt him to answer at that time?

Mr. DRYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator asked where the people would get their coal if Congress passed a law like this. I answer that the railroads would give the independent coal operators something like the number of cars to which they were entitled when they could not use them themselves.

Mr. DRYDEN. Does the Senator from Texas think that the independent coal operators of this country, with their organization as it is to-day, with their facilities for getting coal to market as they exist to-day, could begin to supply the demand of the American people?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I answer by saying that if that is true, the extent of railroad manipulation of the coal supply is greater than I suspected it to be, and shows the necessity for prompt and vigorous action. If the people of this country can not be supplied with coal without permitting the common carriers to violate the plainest and soundest public policy, then I am sure this ought not to be referred to any committee, but it ought to be passed promptly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. DRYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question right here?

Mr. DRYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. In a very short time could not a coal company be incorporated and organized that would go right on with these mines and conduct them in the same way, with the exception that they would have to pay the freight on the coal that any private producer would have to pay? Would not that be the immediate result of the proposed law?

Mr. GALLINGER. Would not that be a trust?

Mr. DRYDEN. Mr. President, there are two matters proposed here for me to comment upon. In the first place, in reply to the Senator from Texas, if it is not the gravamen of the complaint against these great carrying companies that they monopolize the markets, that they hold the public by the throat, then what does all the denunciation we have been hearing amount to? If the independent operators can supply the public, why this outcry against the railroads—against an evil which does not exist?

Mr. BAILEY. They can not supply them because they can not get cars. The railroads now use their cars in hauling their own coal, and, according to the repeated declarations made here, they decline to supply independent operators with sufficient cars.

Mr. DRYDEN. What the Senator from Texas needs, then, is more railroads.

Mr. BAILEY. Not of the kind which misuse their customers and oppress their competitors.

Mr. DRYDEN. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has asked me a question. It is a very easy thing in theory to talk about what may be done with enormous interests and enormous properties, but every practical man knows that you can not take great properties, involving hundreds of millions of dollars, and regulate them by a rule of thumb. These vast interests ramifying into every portion of the country, involving, as they do, sacred trusts, can not be turned over in the twinkling of an eye. These great property interests must be managed conservatively and carefully or they will bring on conditions which will inflict irreparable injury upon every part of the country.

I say it would be utterly impossible to take these great properties, if they began to be of the magnitude which has been stated here and elsewhere, and turn them over without sufficient time to do it. My proposition allows five years, and that is a short time in which to readjust the conditions which would result from the passage of this amendment.

I want it to be understood here and now that I am not opposing the amendment. I am not opposing any fair, reasonable, and workable plan which will bring about the result sought to be accomplished by the amendment. I do not think it is the wisest way to legislate to bring a matter of great national importance of this kind on the floor of the Senate for debate without the careful scrutiny and deliberation of the committee to whom it may be committed; but if it is to be passed, let us at least adopt those measures which it must be obvious to every reflecting man are necessary for the security of the people and of the great interests involved.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I desire to add a proviso, in pursuance of what has been suggested, to the amendment that I offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to perfect his own amendment. The proviso will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the proposed amendment the following words:

Provided, That the provisions of this amendment shall not take effect until the 1st day of May, 1908.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I think there is a practical agreement in the Senate that the business of transportation by interstate carriers ought to be divorced from the business of production by the same carriers. But these amendments raise a large number of novel, intricate, and very important questions—questions as to the right of Congress, the standard of the power of Congress, to regulate commerce. I think the suggestion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] involves for the first time in the history of this country a proposition to forbid a common carrier to engage in interstate commerce, or to prevent a common carrier from engaging in interstate commerce, as a penalty for doing something in a State which is absolutely and perfectly lawful in that State and which the carrier is authorized to do by its charter and by the State authority.

Mr. TILLMAN. In some instances; not always.

Mr. ALDRICH. In an instance.

Mr. TILLMAN. I say in some instances that is the case.

Mr. ALDRICH. I say it is the first time that any such attempt as that has ever been made, I think, in our history as a country, and whether we can do it or ought to do it I suggest to the Senator is a very grave matter. I myself do not believe that it is necessary to go to that extent to prevent this evil, because I conceive it to be an evil.

The Senator from Texas says that if this amendment should go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce—and that opinion seemed to be shared by some other Senators—it would probably never be heard from again, judging from our experience in the consideration of the bill which is now before the Senate. It is true that the Committee on Interstate Commerce was engaged in the consideration of this bill for a number of weeks and that it failed to arrive at a conclusion as to any amendments which it would recommend to the bill; but I suggest to the Senator from Texas and to other Senators that the experience of the Senate in this regard might perhaps be an excuse for not affording a prompt relief or making a prompt report upon a measure of this kind.

I suggest that no Senator has any right to say that the Interstate Commerce Committee would not consider this matter fairly and promptly. The subject-matter of the amendment does not belong to the legislation which we are now considering. It is a kind of discrimination, if it has any place at all or has been legislated upon at all, which is affected by the so-called "Elkins law" and by the provisions of the existing interstate-commerce law, which forbid discriminations.

The recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Chesapeake and Ohio case points clearly to a remedy by Congress for this condition of affairs.

The number and the character of the amendments which are now before the Senate show conclusively that this matter can not properly be acted upon in this manner. The very amendment which the Senator from Texas commends as a model provision is remarkably full of holes, if I am any judge of legislation or of the English language.

It says that no carrier engaged in manufacturing shall engage in interstate commerce; but no penalty is provided, except the penalty that engaging in interstate commerce must cease. Who is to be punished by that penalty?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Rhode Island knows that the general penalty clause of the bill would apply to this.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the penalty in this case is an absolute prohibition of engaging in interstate commerce.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true. That is an additional penalty.

Mr. ALDRICH. How is that to be enforced and against whom is it to be enforced?

Mr. BAILEY. I thought the Senator from Rhode Island——

Mr. ALDRICH. Who is to suffer by this penalty? Not the carrier itself, but the people of the country through which the road runs.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought the Senator from Rhode Island was complaining that there was nobody to suffer. Of course, if he now wants to say that everybody suffers, that is all right.

Mr. ALDRICH. The trouble is that everybody is to suffer——

Mr. BAILEY. Well, if everybody is to suffer——

Mr. ALDRICH. But perhaps the carrier least of all.

Mr. BAILEY. If everybody——

Mr. ALDRICH. The party which is the guilty party is to suffer least of all.

Mr. BAILEY. It is a little remarkable that the carrier, who is to suffer least of all, is complaining most about this legislation.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know that the carrier is complaining, unless the Senator says that I am a carrier. I am complaining.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no, Mr. President; I am not one of those who are always insinuating that the Senator from Rhode Island is actuated by a bad motive. I think the Senator from Rhode Island is just as good as the Republican party. He generally votes the same way that all other orthodox Republicans vote, and, like all of his party associates, he "gets together," and when he can not make the other man surrender, he claims that the other man has surrendered. He has an illustrious example of that, however, in the head of his party, who makes a virtue of his surrender by claiming a victory. I am not one of those who are always impugning the motives of the Senator from Rhode Island, and I do not mean to insinuate that he is a carrier; but I do say he is the carrier's "next best friend" in this legislation. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, what I am trying to point out to the Senate in this case is that this provision, which has the commendation of the Senator from Texas as a perfected piece of legislation which he is asking us to vote upon now and not to refer to a committee, contains no penalty, except to exclude the carrier if he is guilty of manufacturing an engine or of repairing a car, except the exclusion——

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is mistaken. There was an express exception in the amendment which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] sent to the desk.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the exception is——

Mr. BAILEY. It permits a carrier to mine coal for its own use.

Mr. ALDRICH. It permits the carrier to mine coal and to produce other commodities. Does that mean the repairing of a car?

Mr. BAILEY. For their own use; yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. Why? How?

Mr. BAILEY. Because that is for its own use.

Mr. ALDRICH. Well, but it is manufacturing.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand; but if a man manufactures for his own use he is not interfering with——

Mr. ALDRICH. But the amendment does not state that.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator has the wrong amendment; that is all.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have the amendment as to which I asked the Senator from Texas if it was the amendment he had in view, and he said it was.

Mr. BAILEY. I supposed the Senator from Rhode Island was accurate enough to get the amendment which I described as the amendment which the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] accepted from the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. ALDRICH. This is an amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. ELKINS, as modified. I do not know what amendment the Senator refers to. I should be glad to have it.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] will hand the Senator from Rhode Island what I have approved.

Mr. CLAPP. Here it is [handing paper to Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] seems to have seven or eight different amendments and modifications here; and it is not at all strange that any Senator should be somewhat confused as to which particular amendment it was that the Senator from Texas commended.

Mr. BAILEY. Nothing would please me better than to see the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from West Virginia engage in "a fight to a finish on this question." [Laughter.]

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. ALDRICH. The amendment handed me by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] purports to be, on its face, an amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. DANIEL as a substitute for the amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Rhode Island yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALDRICH. I would lose my time if I should do so.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. TILLMAN. I was asking the Senator from Rhode Island to yield to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] first rose. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to him?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is for the Senator from Rhode Island to decide as to which Senator he will yield.

Mr. ALDRICH. Wait a moment. The amendment which is now given me by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] is the precise amendment that I had in my hand and from which I was reading. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ALDRICH. And that shows the utter confusion which has arisen in regard to this matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will yield to anybody who can explain this matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota will state his question of privilege.

Mr. CLAPP. It is that the amendment which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] first read from was not the same as the one I subsequently handed him. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALDRICH. I will ask that it be read from the desk by the Secretary to see if he can discover any difference between the two. I can not.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Rhode Island yield to me?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will after the amendment has been read.

Mr. BAILEY. Let us have this question settled.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] informs me that the written words in the print do not belong there.

Mr. CLAPP. The written words do not belong there.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. Amendment intended to be proposed by——

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the Secretary just read the language of the amendments without the headings.

The Secretary read as follows:

It shall be unlawful for any common carrier engaged in producing, manufacturing, buying, furnishing, or selling, directly or indirectly, coal, coke, or any other commodity, to engage in interstate commerce: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent a carrier from mining coal or producing other commodities exclusively for its own use.

It shall be unlawful for any common carrier engaged in producing, manufacturing, buying, furnishing, or selling, directly or indirectly, coal, coke, or any other commodity, to engage in interstate commerce: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent a carrier from mining coal or producing other commodities exclusively for its own use.

Mr. ALDRICH. Now I yield to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. BAILEY. Before that——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Rhode Island, then, was mistaken when he said that the amendment which he had in his hand did not provide for that exception. I was taking the word of the Senator from Rhode Islnad that he had the right amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator's pardon. It did provide for producing various commodities; but not in relation to the thing that I was asking about, the repairs of cars, manufacturing, etc.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Rhode Island yield to me?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will; but my time is passing.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that interruptions will be taken from the fifteen minutes belonging to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will yield to the Senator from South Carolina for a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator mentioned a moment ago that there were several amendments offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have the whole catalogue of the amendments which have been offered, which my clerk has prepared; and I notice that the Senator from West Virginia has one on page 7, one on page 29, one on page 33, one on page 35, one on page 87, one on page 101, one on page 127, one on page 129, one on page 145, one on page 147, and one on page 161. So he has got a pretty good flock of them. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. I was not talking about the amendments of——

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALDRICH. No; I have not the time. I have but a minute left.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island declines to yield.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was not discussing the amendments of the Senator from West Virginia as offered to this bill generally, but there are some half a dozen amendments or modifications of amendments on this particular subject offered by the Senator from West Virginia with the assistance of various Senators on both sides of the Chamber.

Mr. ELKINS. Now, Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

Mr. ELKINS. I want to correct the Senator from Rhode Island. He stated that there were a half dozen amendments offered by the Senator from West Virginia on this subject. There is but one amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia now before the Senate, and that is the one pending. Why, then, does he go to search for a lot of other amendments which I have not offered?

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator did offer an amendment, which was in printed form, which he has certainly modified two or three different times.

Mr. ELKINS. I have not——

Mr. ALDRICH. And which has been printed two or three different times.

Mr. ELKINS. I had two amendments on this subject, but offered only one of them. So the Senator is entirely incorrect in his statement when he says that I have offered six or seven amendments. I have not done so. I have offered but one.

Mr. ALDRICH. I admit that there is but one amendment that is now pending before the Senate, because there could be but one. If there had been within the range of parliamentary law any possibility of having more than one pending, the Senator would have had them pending. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator did me an injustice in saying that I had five or six amendments on this subject. I will be entirely satisfied if the Senator will vote for this one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is obliged to announce that the time of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] has expired.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then I will speak later upon some other amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think it is fairly demonstrated that there is a good deal of confusion in regard to these amendments. All I desire to say is that it seems to me that the best way to deal with this most important question would be to send it to the committee and have a proper bill presented to the Senate. I personally should not care to vote for that disposition of the subject, unless I could be assured beyond any reasonable peradventure that the matter would be disposed of at this session of Congress.

I think the question involved in this amendment is more important by far than all the local discriminations which this bill undertakes to cure. I do not think that, having given the whole winter to this subject, we can afford to adjourn this session without acting on it.

The ownership by the railroad companies of these great properties which comprise the necessities of life is an admitted evil. The attitude of the Supreme Court in the Chesapeake and Ohio case recognizes such ownership as contrary to sound public policy. It is idle to say that we are unable to deal with it or to stop it. If we are to be paralyzed in dealing with such an evil as this, then the interstate-commerce clause in the Constitution is utterly vain.

I should much prefer, as I have said, to see this matter referred to the committee if we can be assured that we shall deal with it conclusively and finally at this session; but, without that assurance and without that understanding, I think the Senate had better deal with it here to-day and to-morrow and for a week, if necessary, until we shall have secured suitable legislation that shall put an end to the operation by the railroads of great natural productions, which are absolutely vital to the well-being of the people of this country.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment. The question of the relation between the ownership and the production of coal and other commodities is not a new question. We had it before our committee a year ago this very month. We took testimony on it, and it was the testimony of railroad men. The greatest manager of transportation in the world to-day candidly stated that they ought to be absolutely divorced.

This subject has been considered, not by reference to the committee, but certainly by members of the committee, and it must have been considered by everyone who has contemplated the ultimate dealing with this question at this session of Congress.

Personally I have always insisted to the Senator from West Virginia that this measure belonged properly in the bill as an amendment to the law of 1903; but he felt during all this time that it would be impossible to get this measure through as a separate provision of law, and therefore was anxious to have it adopted as an amendment to this bill.

I fully agree with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] that now is the proper time to dispose of this question. The fact that when we act we may interfere with people who have engaged in this business jointly will always confront Congress when Congress shall seek to act upon this question.

There never can be a solution of a great question designed to cure a great evil but that it may perhaps operate as a hardship upon some one. I believe a reasonable time given for the operation of this bill would be sufficient to relieve it of that objection.

I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that if there could be an assurance that we could deal with this subject and dispose of it at this session it might be well to consider it in the committee; but we should have not only the delay incident to committee investigation, but we should have the delay incident to legislation in both Houses of Congress, and at a time when both Houses are being crowded with the current business as it approaches the closing hours of the session. Therefore, Mr. President, realizing the importance of this question, nevertheless I for one shall feel constrained to vote to dispose of it at this time as an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator think, if this were in the form of an independent bill, that the Senate should give it considerable time in legislating upon it and passing it?

Mr. CLAPP. Only so far as considering the details of the provision. The fact that this is an evil is a recognized fact; the fact that production and transportation should be divorced is a recognized fact; and the fact that hardship will flow from that divorcement for the time being must be a conceded fact.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. All of those things there is no question about; but what I am asking the Senator now is a practical question of legislation. He said that if the bill were reported from the committee it would take considerable time in the process of legislation.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That, I assume the Senator means, would be because it is an important subject which should have the patient consideration of the Senate before it is passed?

Mr. CLAPP. Not necessarily. It would be for this reason——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, for any reason.

Mr. CLAPP. Ninety Senators would have ninety opinions that would have to be thrashed out, just as they have to be thrashed out to-day.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That brings me to the question that I finally wanted to ask the Senator. If he thinks it would consume time to deal with this subject properly if it were an independent bill, does he think that it will take less time to deal properly with this subject as an amendment to this bill?

Mr. CLAPP. It may take no less time; but dealing with it as an amendment to this bill assures its being dealt with and passed at this session of Congress.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am quite willing to do that, but I wanted the Senator's opinion upon that subject. That it is very important that we should not presently act upon it seems to me to be clear.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. FORAKER. I want to ask the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] a question, if I may, before he takes his seat. The Senator says that he desires a vote upon this proposition now. I want to know whether or not he has determined yet in what form he thinks this amendment should be adopted? When the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] offered the amendment the Senator from Minnesota drafted it in a different form, expressing what is understood to be the same proposition; but I do not know whether that is before the Senate or not. Can the Senator tell me?

Mr. CLAPP. I understand that it is before the Senate on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

Answering the Senator's first inquiry, I will say that I know just what I would vote for if I were framing the amendment, but I have no pride of opinion. The same object is covered substantially by the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]—that is, to put a stop to the union of transportation and production. The only way we can reach it is to prohibit the producer from engaging in interstate traffic.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will not take his seat for a moment. I am quite as earnest about accomplishing that purpose as the Senator can be. I have repeatedly stated that on the floor of the Senate; but I am at a loss, in view of the many propositions that have been presented, to know to which one to give preference; and the Senator has given so much attention to this subject that I have great confidence in his judgment about it, and I want to get the benefit of his opinion.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator has such confidence in my judgment, it is my deliberate judgment that the Senate can spend time to no better advantage than by taking up now, at this time, and reconciling these views and working out an amendment to this bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I agree with the Senator about that; but I want to know which one of these propositions the Senator is advocating, if he can tell me, and if he is advocating any one in particular——

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator vote for the one I advocate?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know whether I will or not.

Mr. CLAPP. Then what difference does it make to the Senator which one I advocate?

Mr. FORAKER. I probably would vote for it, because I think my mind runs very much as the Senator's does; but if the Senator can not tell me which one he advocates, he has no right to ask me if I will vote for the one he advocates. I am asking him in good faith. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] offered an amendment. It was printed, and it was read to the Senate. We all understand what it provided. He offered only one amendment. Then the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], not being satisfied with that or for some reason—I do not know what the reason was—made a draft of an amendment to take the place, as a substitute, of the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia. That was read, and it is printed in the RECORD; but I do not know whether it is before the Senate or not. Nobody seems to know whether it is or not. I saw a while ago that the Senator from New Jersey offered an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia as printed.

Mr. CLAPP. I thought the Senator desired to ask me a question.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. I beg the Senator's pardon. He insisted that I should retain the floor.

Mr. FORAKER. I insisted that the Senator should retain the floor until I could get an answer to a question.

Mr. CLAPP. I want to answer if I can get an opportunity to do so.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to try to find out in good faith what we are considering.

Mr. CLAPP. Give me a moment.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will wait until I get ready, I will give him a moment. The Senator from New Jersey offered his amendment, not to the substitute that was prepared by the Senator from Minnesota and which the Senator from West Virginia had read from the desk as a substitute, as I understood, but to the original amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, and we have been proceeding here as though this original amendment was still before the Senate. I wanted to know to what amendment the Senator was speaking, if he could tell me. I do not know whether it is this one, or the other one, or the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], or the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN].

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator's question, my own personal choice of an amendment would be as follows:

> It shall be unlawful for any common carrier engaged in producing, manufacturing, buying, furnishing, or selling, directly or indirectly, coal, coke, or other commodity to engage in interstate commerce: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent a carrier from mining coal or producing other commodities exclusively for its own use.

Mr. FORAKER rose.

Mr. CLAPP. One moment. It has been suggested—and perhaps the suggestion is a wise one—to limit that prohibition to the articles produced by the carrier. It has further been suggested—and no doubt that suggestion is a wise one—that a time be fixed in the future when the provision shall take effect. Those are all matters that follow the general central thought of the prohibition, and upon which it does seem to me the Senate ought to be able to come to some rational agreement.

Mr. FORAKER. I am very much obliged to the Senator, for he has answered just about as I supposed he would; but still I do not know what is before the Senate as the amendment that is being considered. By that I mean, Mr. President, that I do not know whether the Senator from West Virginia is still insisting upon his original amendment or whether we are considering the amendment that was drafted by the Senator from Minnesota, which he has just now read from the RECORD, which I understood the Senator from West Virginia to offer as a modification of his amendment yesterday.

Mr. LODGE. As a means of solving these doubts, I suggest that the Secretary read the pending amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the one proposed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], which the Secretary will state.

Mr. FORAKER. I make this inquiry, Mr. President: Certainly the Senator from West Virginia yesterday offered as a modification of his own amendment the amendment that has just now been read by the Senator from Minnesota——

Mr. ELKINS. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I did not accept that substitute.

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, then, it is all cleared up. I understood that the Senator did accept it.

Mr. ELKINS. No; I said if it reached the purpose at which I aimed, which was the correcting of this evil and abuse, then I would accept it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. I did not yield the floor. I want to speak briefly.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the pending amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from Massachusetts, the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia will be stated.

Mr. ELKINS. I desire to say that on motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] the words "authorized by its charter to do so" were stricken out. The amendment will stand now with those words stricken out.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from West Virginia originally offered the following——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the amendment I desire to have read is the amendment that is pending, not what the Senator from West Virginia originally offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment that is pending.

The SECRETARY. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey——

Mr. LODGE. I do not mean the amendment to the amendment. I know there is an amendment to the amendment. I asked for the reading of the amendment, not the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the substantive proposition now before the Senate, as I understand, is the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that the amendment before the Senate now is an amendment to further perfect the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. I still adhere to my belief that the best way to find out what amendment is pending is to have the pending amendment read; and I ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I want the amendment read. I do not want some other Senator to tell me what is the pending amendment, but I want the Secretary to read it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not want to tell the Senator what the pending amendment was.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey——

Mr. LODGE. That is an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TILLMAN. We have had so many amendments, substitutes, and amendments to amendments, and so many speeches by Senators who have no right, under the unanimous-consent agreement, to get on their feet any more, that we are "all balled up," if I may use the expression; and, if I am in order, I move to lay the pending amendment and all amendments thereto and substitutes therefor on the table, because I want to offer one myself and get started over again.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. That motion is not debatable.

The Secretary proceeded to read as follows:

It shall be unlawful for any common carrier engaged in producing, manufacturing, buying, furnishing, or selling, directly or indirectly, coal, coke, or any other commodity, to engage in interstate commerce.

Mr. ALDRICH. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island will please state his question of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to move that the pending amendment and the amendment to which it is offered as an amendment lie upon the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the motion.

Mr. LODGE. That does not cut off reporting the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands, and intended to present the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to the Senate after the amendment had been stated.

Mr. FORAKER. Before we undertake to lay the amendment on the table, we ought to know what the amendment is.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow the Secretary to report the amendment, which is the only thing in order, we shall know.

Mr. FORAKER. That is what I am waiting for.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In order that the Senate may clearly understand the question, the Chair will restate it. The Senator from South Carolina moves to lay on the table the pending amendment and amendments incident thereto.

Mr. DANIEL. I rise to a parliamentary question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DANIEL. A point of order was made against the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to lay on the table—that he made a speech before making the motion, which was not in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Does the Chair propose to submit to the Senate the question whether a motion to lay on the table is in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is precisely the question.

Mr. BACON. The Chair will pardon me for a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Upon the particular ground stated by the Senator from Virginia, or whether it is generally in order? The reason I ask the question is if the latter——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, this is debate.

Mr. BACON. I desire to make a point of order. A motion to lay on the table is not in order——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is going to submit to the Senate the question whether the motion is in order.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. ALDRICH. This is debate.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say a word on that subject.

Mr. LODGE. I understood the Chair to say that he proposed to submit the question of order to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does.

Mr. LODGE. That is not debatable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands and will recognize no Senator for debate until that question is disposed of.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will recall that on Thursday or Friday last the Chair submitted to its consideration whether, under the unanimous-consent agreement, a motion to lay an amendment on the table before the close of the debate under the fifteen-minute rule was in order. The Senate did not then decide the question brought to its attention by the Chair. The question now rises in a distinct and parliamentary way. Therefore the Chair will submit to the Senate the question whether the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to lay on the table is in order.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia rise to a point of order?

Mr. BACON. I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. BACON. The point I make is that a question of order is always debatable, at least to the extent of stating the grounds on which it is based.

Mr. HALE. Not a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. BACON. The question whether the motion to lay on the table is in order is a debatable question, undoubtedly. The motion to lay on the table itself is not debatable, but whether or not, as a matter of order, that motion is in order is undoubtedly debatable. Every question of order is debatable, and the question of order which I raise is whether or not, under the consent agreement, a motion to lay on the table is in order, and I am in order, I think, Mr. President, to submit reasons why that point of order is good. If there is any rule or practice under which under any circumstances a point of order is not debatable to the extent indicated, unless it is pending some other question which does not permit of it, I do not know of it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The twentieth rule, section 1, reads as follows:

A question of order may be raised at any stage of the proceedings, except when the Senate is dividing, and, unless submitted to the Senate, shall be decided by the presiding officer without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate.

Section 2 of that rule——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Let us hear the Chair.

Mr. BACON. I ask the Chair's pardon.

Mr. HALE. Let the Chair complete his statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Section 2 of Rule XX provides:

The presiding officer may submit any question of order for the decision of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits the question of order to the determination of the Senate, and he is of the opinion that neither the order nor the propriety of its submission to the Senate is debatable.

Mr. HALE. I ask, Mr. President, whether in all logic, and for the purpose of completing any business before the Senate, the submission by the Chair to the Senate of a proposition of order should not be subject to a different rule from that which would apply if the Chair ruled on the point of order. Otherwise, Mr. President, we may as well go on, because if this can be debated, then any motion to lay on the table may just as well be debated. But the stringency that is intended to follow a motion to lay on the table and which is intended to bring a conclusion, and the purpose for which it is inserted in the rule, must be followed out in its result to the question that is submitted to the Senate by the Chair on a motion to lay on the table. If not, then there is no avail in submitting it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not for a moment question the contention of the Senator that so far as the motion to lay on the table itself is concerned, it is not debatable. The quesion which I raise is whether, under the terms of the particular consent order under which we are proceeding, which says that amendments shall be discussed, and after discussion shall be disposed of, a motion to lay on the table is in order before the discussion of an amendment is ended. That is my point; and I say it is undoubtedly a correct one, if the consent order means anything at all. I freely grant that after the discussion of an amendment which has been proposed it is in order for the Senate to dispose of it under the consent rule, either by voting directly upon it or upon a motion to lay on the table. But the consent order is that we shall dispose of amendments after discussion, and a motion to lay on the table is in direct contravention of and antagonism to that consent until the amendment is so discussed. Without the consent order no vote of any kind would now be in order upon these amendments. I have stated the point.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, it has been well settled here, and, I think, everywhere else, that pending a motion which is not debatable in itself all subordinate and collateral questions must be settled without debate. Otherwise, under the guise of raising questions of order, debate might be continued forever. I think the Chair is entirely right and that no discussion ought to be permitted.

Mr. BACON. The Senator would be correct if we were proceeding under the ordinary rules, but we are proceeding under a consent agreement which is in conflict with the rules.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Is the motion of the Senator from South Carolina in order?

Mr. CULBERSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is the motion?

Mr. LODGE. To lay on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia and all amendments incident thereto.

Mr. CULBERSON. I make the point of order that a motion to lay all of the amendments on the table at one time can not be made. There are different amendments pending here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is going to leave the question to the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Chair indulge me for a moment? I had no purpose or desire to do other than to get the Senate out of the tangle into which we have gotten.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, debate is out of order.

Mr. TILLMAN. We have an amendment and an amendment to it and a substitute, and I have moved to lay them on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair decides that all debate is out of order. The only question before the Senate is this: Is the motion of the Senator from South Carolina in order?

Mr. HALE. Question!

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Those who are of opinion that the motion is in order will say "aye;" the contrary "no." In the opinion of the Chair——

Mr. LODGE. I do not think that was understood.

Mr. HALE. Will the Chair again state the question, and let us have a division upon it?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the motion of the Senator from South Carolina in order?

Mr. HALE. That is it. Let the Chair put that. I do not think the Chair was understood.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the motion of the Senator from South Carolina in order?

Mr. CULLOM and Mr. TELLER. A division.

Mr. HALE. We may as well have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Those who are of opinion that the motion is in order will answer "yea" as their names are called, and those who are opposed will answer "nay."

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that the motion——

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and called the name of Mr. ALDRICH.

Mr. LODGE. It is impossible to hear the Secretary or anybody else.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that the motion of the Senator from South Carolina may be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. The first name had been called on the roll call.

Mr. DANIEL. Not when I spoke. It had not been before I addressed the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was not called when the Senator addressed the Chair.

Mr. DANIEL. May I be permitted to make a statement?

Several SENATORS. No! No!

Mr. LODGE. Statements are out of order.

Mr. DANIEL. I had addressed the Chair before a name was read, and the Chair referred to the fact that order should be restored.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that debate is not in order, regardless of the question whether or not the roll call had been commenced.

Mr. HALE. Question!

Mr. BURKETT. May I ask a parliamentary inquiry? There is some discussion here as to what we are voting on. We are voting on the ability to entertain the motion to lay on the table, and not on the motion to lay on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not on the motion to lay on the table, but upon the question whether the Chair shall entertain the motion.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to a point of order. There is so much confusion that the responses can not possibly be heard.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order, and the roll call will be suspended until it is in order. [After a pause.] The Secretary will resume the calling of the roll.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the calling of the roll.

The result was announced—yeas 51, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—51.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that under the interpretation of the Senate the motion to lay on the table is in order. The question, therefore, is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] that the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and amendments incident thereto be laid upon the table. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair the "noes" have it.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays? In the opinion of the Chair there is not.

Mr. LODGE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the motion is to lay upon the table the pending amendment and the amendments pending thereto. Nothing else can be laid upon the table.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CULBERSON. The motion of the Senator from South Carolina is to lay on the table the pending amendment and all other amendments upon this question.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is entirely wrong. I did not make any such motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will ask the Senator from South Carolina to restate his motion.

Mr. TILLMAN. My motion was to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia and amendments thereto or substitutes therefor.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is about as I understand it.

Mr. TILLMAN. There can be but two.

Mr. CULBERSON. If it is more than one, it is in the plural.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair put the question to the Senate, and understood it to refuse to lay on the table the amendment and pending amendments thereto.

Mr. HALE. There has been so much confusion——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order. The Chair must request Senators to refrain from audible conversation in the Chamber, and the business of the Senate will be suspended until there is order.

Mr. HALE. The Senate has been so noisy it is impossible to know what has been done. I do not know what has become of the call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair asked if there was a second to the demand of the Senator from Maine for the yeas and nays upon the question of agreeing to the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair was of opinion that there was not a second, as not one-fifth of the Senators present seconded the call.

Mr. HALE. There was so much confusion that nobody knew that. I did not.

Mr. CULLOM. Neither did I.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is doubt about it, the Chair will again ask whether there is a second to the demand of the Senator from Maine for the call of the roll? [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair there is.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 29, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—29.

Aldrich	Cullom	Lodge	Spooner
Allee	Dick	Long	Sutherland
Ankeny	Frye	McEnery	Tillman

So the motion to lay on the table was rejected.

Mr. HALE. We have now got back to just where we started. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALDRICH. Before that is done, I wish to state that I voted to lay these amendments on the table, because I believed that the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] was much better than the pending proposition; not that I cared to dispose of the question in that way.

I ask unanimous consent that the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina be now read, in order that it may appear in the RECORD and be taken up for consideration in the morning.

Mr. LODGE. And printed.

Mr. ALDRICH. And printed.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before that is done I desire to say that I voted against the motion of the Senator from South Carolina because I believed it was distinctly in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement, and for the further reason that I never had heard of the amendment to which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] seems to have had access. I do not know what it is, and even if I had thought that we could adopt, under the unanimous-consent agreement, the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, I would not have voted for it on the ground that there was an amendment better than those pending. I think the Senate is fully capable of proceeding under the unanimous-consent agreement and disposing of this business, if it will be patient in its work.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Before the Senator takes his seat——

Mr. HALE. I must insist, as this gives rise to debate——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I want to say only one word.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will wait.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine withhold his motion?

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator from Maine will permit the amendment to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana rose to ask a question of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will wait.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish the Senator from Maine would allow this proposed amendment to be printed.

Mr. HALE. I will do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

Mr. HALE. Very well; let it be read. I will withhold my motion for that purpose.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to say, in answer to the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire, that according to the precedents and usages laying on the table is not a violation of the consent rule in this case.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is news to me.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I must——

Mr. GALLINGER. Where a unanimous-consent agreement specifically says that we shall dispose of an amendment after the discussion closes, and some Senator desires to discuss it, I confess it is news to me that it may be overridden by any parliamentary procedure.

Mr. TELLER. When we have agreed on a particular time to vote, that presents another question. We only agreed that the discussion should proceed in this way. I made the statement when the question was before the Senate the other day that if anybody abused the consent agreement, or we thought it was abused, we would still have a right to move to lay an amendment on the table, for such was already the rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the Senator's statement does not make a rule.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HALE. I think it is in the interest of good legislation that the Senate should let this matter depart from its mind for the present and think of it over night. We will be in better condition to legislate to-morrow than now.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Maine yield to me to make a statement?

Mr. HALE. Half a dozen Senators have asked me to yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. TILLMAN. When I moved half an hour ago to lay the amendment on the table I had no purpose of trying to force the Senate to consider something of my own, because it is not my own. I stated yesterday very frankly the perplexities and the magnitude of this question as it has presented itself to my mind, and I also stated that I had asked half a dozen or more great lawyers to give me the benefit of their legal ability and experience to try to frame something which would meet the difficulty.

I have here four suggested amendments, and I have three or four in my desk. None of them have ever satisfied me, because there are perplexities about this question that Senators are just beginning to realize, and the further it is discussed and the more effort is made to destroy the evil which we all recognize, without doing great harm to other interests, the greater difficulty will be found of using language and putting in provisions that will protect such cases as were instanced by the Senator from North Carolina in the lumber road and others that I have indicated.

Therefore, I hope the Senate will not consider that in moving to lay this amendment on the table it was for the purpose of exploiting myself at all, because this is not my work. I have amended it a little, but it does not satisfy me yet, and it will not satisfy the Senate. But I found the Senate had reached a point where we were, as I said, "balled up." We had an amendment, an amendment to the amendment, and a substitute for the amendment, and we apparently had got to a point where we could not do anything but talk. Senators were breaking the unanimous-consent agreement by speaking twice on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, when under the agreement they could not do it. So I tried to untie the knot, or to cut it; that is all. I hope Senators will not undertake to accuse me of egotism in their hearts or in other ways because I took this action. That is all there is about it. Now, I want to present the amendment, and I ask to have it printed. It is to come in at the end of section 1.

Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from Rhode Island, the amendment will be read.

Mr. HALE. The motion for an executive session is in order. Nothing else is in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is, if the Senator from Maine insists upon it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the amendment be read, so that it may go into the RECORD.

Mr. HALE. The Senator asks that and another Senator asks for another thing. I will consent that the amendment be read. After that I will insist upon the motion, and the Senate can decide as it chooses on the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment sent to the desk by the Senator from South Carolina.

The Secretary read as follows:

At the end of section 1 add:

"From and after the 1st day of January, 1908, it shall be unlawful for any carrier owning or operating any railroad used in interstate commerce to engage in interstate commerce when it can be shown that such railroad, directly or indirectly, by stock ownership or otherwise, has or holds any control, part ownership, or interest in the business of mining or manufacturing or trading in any commodity transported over such railroad as interstate commerce; nor shall any such common carrier, after the date aforesaid, directly or indirectly, engage in any other business than that of a common carrier, or hold or acquire lands, freehold or leasehold, directly or indirectly, except such as shall be necessary for carrying on its business as a common carrier.

"Any violation of this provision shall subject the offending common carrier to a forfeiture of $2,000 for each offense, and in case of a continuing violation each day shall be deemed a separate offense. Such forfeiture or forfeitures shall be recovered in a civil suit in the name of the United States, brought under the direction of the Attorney-General, in the United States circuit court for the district wherein the carrier has its principal operating office, or in any district through which the road of the carrier may be operated."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Maine withhold his motion for an executive session until the Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States and some messages from the House of Representatives?

Mr. HALE. And for nothing else.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. And for nothing else.

ARMY SUPPLIES AT SAN FRANCISCO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. HALE, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I herewith transmit a letter from the Secretary of War in respect to the situation as to the Army supplies at San Francisco. His letter contains appendices showing the supplies which have been transmitted to San Francisco and their cost, and set forth the necessity for an additional appropriation of $500,000, which I recommend be made at once. This is to meet the requirements of the immediate future.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 8, 1906.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14397) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HULL, Mr. CAPRON, and Mr. SULZER managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14397) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, that the request for a conference by the House be granted, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. WARREN, Mr. FORAKER, and Mr. BLACKBURN were appointed.

REGULATION OF MOTOR BOATS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4094) to amend section 4426 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, regulation of motor boats, which was, on page 3, line 2, after the word "hire," to insert "but not engaged in fishing as a regular business."

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the bill, with the amendment, be referred to the Committee on Commerce. I shall have to do that. I established a precedent the other day and I will have to ask that this amendment take that course. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

MARY E. DUGGER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1975) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Dugger, which was, in line 6, after the name "Jefferson," to insert the initial "L."

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

FORT DOUGLAS MILITARY RESERVATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5498) granting additional lands from the Fort Douglas Military Reservation to the University of Utah, which was, on page 2, line 16, to strike out all after the word "further," down to and including "Utah," line 20, and insert:

That there is reserved to the United States the perpetual right to maintain, alter, rebuild, and enlarge the sewer which runs from the Fort Douglas military post across said tract of land, or to construct and maintain a new sewer system across the same should it be desirable so to do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands or whatever committee it came from.

Mr. CULLOM. It came from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALDRICH. They can report it back to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill originally was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WARREN. The matter has the full indorsement of the War Department. It has passed the Senate both as a separate bill and in the Army appropriation bill. The Senate bill now has passed the House with an amendment. I hope that the bill may receive final action here, so that the provision can be stricken out of the Army appropriation bill when it is considered by the conferees.

Mr. ALDRICH. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island withdraws his motion to refer. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY LAND GRANT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2292) for the relief of certain entrymen and settlers within the limits of the Northern Pacific Railway land grant, which was on page 2, line 8, after the word "abandoned" to insert:

Provided, That all lieu selections made under this act shall be confined to lands within the State where the private holdings are situated.

SEC. 2. That this act shall become effective upon an acceptance thereof by the Northern Pacific Railway Company being filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think I will have to ask that that go to the Committee on Public Lands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill and amendment will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I call for the regular order. The rest of these matters can wait.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 9, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 8, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ZEBULON MONTGOMERY PIKE MONUMENT ASSOCIATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 13743) to provide souvenir medallions for the Zebulon Montgomery Pike Monument Association, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Colorado, that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 5796) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River and establish it as a post-road.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Kansas City, St. Joseph and Excelsior Springs Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct a railroad, wagon, and foot bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River at a point on the north boundary line of Kansas City, Mo., to a point opposite the said Kansas City, Mo., on the north side of said river, in Clay County, in the State of Missouri, said bridge to be so placed as to be erected between what is known as Delaware street and Lydia avenue, in Kansas City, Mo., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ELLIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill H. R. 18532, a similar bill to the one just passed, on the House Calendar, be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that a similar House bill be laid upon the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

OFFENSES AGAINST ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I present herewith for filing the report of the majority on the bill (H. R. 224) in relation to the elective franchise, defining offenses against the same and prescribing punishments therefor, and I ask unanimous consent that the minority may have ten days in which to submit a minority report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the minority may have ten days in which to file a minority report on the bill just referred to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the bill (H. R. 14397) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, with Senate amendments thereto, with the recommendation that all Senate amendments be disagreed to and that the House request a conference thereon; and I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, reports back the Army appropriation bill with Senate amendments thereto, which is referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Senate amendments thereto.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 151, noes 3.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and three gentlemen present—a quorum.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate amendments to the military appropriation bill, with Mr. BOUTELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee recommend that the House nonconcur in the amendment just reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, that the committee recommend that the House nonconcur in the amendment just reported.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the committee that the unanimous vote of the Committee on Military Affairs was nonconcurrence in all the Senate amendments, and that a conference be asked for. I therefore ask unanimous consent that a motion to nonconcur in all the amendments en bloc be now entertained.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the remaining amendments may be considered in gross. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I now move that the committee recommend that all the amendments of the Senate to the Army appropriation bill be disagreed to, and that a conference be asked for.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the committee recommend nonconcurrence in all the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOUTELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration Senate amendments to the Army appropriation bill and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that the amendments be nonconcurred in and a conference requested.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the vote will be taken on the amendments as a whole.

Mr. HULL. I move the adoption of the report.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, there is one amendment to which I desire in some form or other to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands a separate vote upon what amendment?

Mr. PRINCE. I think it is number 27—at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. This is the proper time.

Mr. HULL. Does the gentleman desire to concur in the amendment?

Mr. PRINCE. I do not.

Mr. HULL. If he does, of course it is the proper time; but my understanding is, he desires to nonconcur in the amendment, and that is the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole on all of them.

Mr. PRINCE. I desire to nonconcur in this amendment and would like to have the House conferees instructed to insist on refusing to concur in amendment No. 27, which will give a cadet who serves in West Point an opportunity to retire with the rank, pay, and allowance of a major-general.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I hope there will be no action by members of the committee to instruct the conferees before they have had a free conference. We have had that trouble once or twice and it seems to me like very bad policy to do so.

The SPEAKER. If the House should vote to nonconcur in any or all of the amendments, that is a matter with which the House would express its will. If the House should not concur, then, as the Chair understands, when the conferees are appointed, or just before they are appointed, the gentleman could offer any resolution that he saw proper touching the sense of the House as to any or all amendments.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, then I want to make the motion that the House instruct the conferees to nonconcur——

The SPEAKER. That is not in order just at this time. The question is on the motion that the House disagree to the Senate amendments.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that a conference be requested on the part of the House, and that the Chair appoint conferees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the House ask for a conference with the Senate.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to embarrass my colleagues on the committee in the conference in any way, but I am unalterably opposed, and I believe when the House hears the facts that the House will likewise be unalterably opposed, to concurring in amendment No. 27, offered by the other body. The amendment is this: "That officers who served creditably during the civil war and who now hold the rank of brigadier-general on the active list of the Army, having previously held that rank for two years or more, shall, when retired from active service, have the rank and retired pay of major-general." Now, when we analyze this and bring it before the House it will show that captains, first lieutenants——

Mr. PAYNE. I think the amendment ought to be read, so the House will understand it.

Mr. PRINCE. I tried to read it——

The SPEAKER. Up to this time we are proceeding by unanimous consent, inasmuch as the gentleman from Illinois has made no motion.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the conferees be instructed to nonconcur in Senate amendment No. 27.

Mr. KEIFER. That has already been done.

Mr. HULL. I understand that we have nonconcurred in all of them.

The SPEAKER. We have nonconcurred in all of them. The Chair might suggest to the gentleman that he can probably reach what he desires to reach by resolution, if he wishes to test the sense of the House. That will register the opinion of the House that the conferees ought not to recede from the House disagreement to the amendment.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I make that proper motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

(27) Provided further, That officers who served creditably during the civil war and who now hold the rank of brigadier-general on the active list of the Army, having previously held that rank for two years or more, shall, when retired from active service, have the rank and retired pay of major-general.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that the House conferees should not recede from the House disagreement to Senate amendment No. 27 to the bill (H. R. 14397) making appropriations for the support of the Army.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to allow officers on the active list of the Army and holding the rank of brigadier-general, having previously held that rank for two years, who had service in the civil war, when they are retired from active service to be retired upon the rank and pay of major-general. The purpose is to retire with the rank of major-general men who have served in the civil war, and the credit for this rank is due to their service during the civil war. If that be true for civil-war service, we ought to put upon the retired list all of the splendid men who fought in the civil war and have been retired at a lower grade than that of major-general; not only those who are on the retired list of the Regular Army, but all of the men, officers and privates, who served in the civil war as volunteers and are to-day in civil life in this country.

Here is an instance of pure and simple personal legislation. The House did not pass it. It has come to us from another body, and it picks out six or seven men on whom to bestow the rank and distinction of major-general for service in the civil war. Now, what was their service in the civil war? One of them was a captain. He entered the service as a second lieutenant on September 16, 1861, and was honorably mustered out as a captain in 1865. Another entered the service as a private October 12, 1861, and was mustered out as a first lieutenant September 30, 1864; another as a private November 13, 1861, and mustered out as a captain July 17, 1865; another as a private and mustered out as a captain; another as a private and mustered out as a captain; two more as privates and mustered out as first lieutenants; another entered as a sergeant and was mustered out as a second lieutenant; another as a private and mustered out as a sergeant; another as a medical cadet of about one year's service, and he is to be made a major-general for that one year's service as a steward or a surgeon in a hospital. Another who was mustered out as a first lieutenant is to be made a major-general. And, not satisfied with that, Mr. Speaker, they have even gone so far, if this amendment becomes a law, as to take in a young man who entered West Point as a cadet in 1861 and graduated in 1865, and said that he shall become a major-general under this amendment, if the House approves of it.

Mr. SULZER. What is his name?

Mr. PRINCE. His name is Gen. George H. Burton, inspector-general; cadet in the Military Academy July 1, 1861; graduated from the Military Academy June 23, 1865; made a second lieutenant of that date.

If this amendment passes, gentlemen of the House, you take a cadet that entered West Point in 1861, that received his commission after the war closed, in 1865, and make him a major-general for services rendered during the civil war. Why do I say that? Because it has been held under the law that a cadet at West Point was in the line of the Army, was subject to military control and discipline; and if he entered the Military Academy before peace was declared, he is a soldier in the line of the Army, and under the provision of this amendment he is made a major-general on the retired list.

Now, I am willing to go a long way toward placing men on the retired list, but I can not sit still in my seat and allow this kind of work in this House without informing the country.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRINCE. Certainly.

Mr. SULZER. Does not the gentleman think that it is inadvisable for the House to instruct the conferees, its own conferees, before they go into conference? Would it not be premature and tend to establish a faulty precedent?

Mr. PRINCE. If I felt sure in my own mind that the conferees will go and resist to the uttermost this amendment; if they will come back to this House before concurring in the amendment and permit us to instruct them later and stand by the instruction, I would be perfectly willing to withdraw it now, if it is inadvisable.

Mr. SULZER. Has the gentleman any reason to assume to the contrary?

Mr. PRINCE. I have so long been a Member of this House that I have found time and time again in the closing days this House takes a good many amendments and concurs in them when in its judgment, and the judgment of the people, they ought not to be accepted. My colleague has seen the same thing done.

Mr. SULZER. If, however, the conferees appointed by the House should take any action in the conference contrary to the views of the gentleman from Illinois, when the conference report comes before the House the gentleman can then move to disagree and instruct the conferees. Under the rules the gentleman's rights are amply protected, and that is the usual procedure under the rules of this House. It has been followed ever since I have been a Member.

Mr. PRINCE. There are two methods of procedure; the one I have adopted, and the one that you suggest.

Now, let me say to the House, and to the country as well, that from the day the first shot was fired at Lexington down to 1861 there was no such thing as a retired list. The men who followed Washington during all of that struggle were patriotic enough not to ask to be put upon the retired list.

The army of men that fought under Jackson, under Ripley and Scott and Brown, in the war of 1812 never asked to be put upon the retired list. Nor was there a retired list in this country for the men that fought and gave us the great country from Mexico. They were never put upon the retired list, nor was there any such retired list of the Army until the beginning of the struggle between the North and the South in the days from 1861 to 1865.

Now the retired list has got to be a place for men to be put to draw salaries. That is what it is for. It has ceased to be a haven of rest for honorable and distinguished battle-scarred old warriors. It has passed the purpose for which it was originated, and to-day we have one-fifth of the Army officers of the United States upon the retired list, drawing $2,700,000, where their predecessors, moved by patriotic motives, never asked for a cent and were never placed upon the retired list of the Army of this country; and when 903 are on the retired list, one-fifth of the officers of the United States Army, it is time that we should put these men on the retired list under a law of the grade that they held at the time they were retired. And what is it? It is three-fourths pay. These men who hardly did anything during the struggle of 1861 to 1865 are now to be put on the retired list with a pension of $5,625 a year, while the splendid men that fought in the volunteer service, many of them to-day are starving in their homes and receiving the pitiful pension of six and eight and ten and twelve dollars a month. [Loud applause.]

I call upon my colleagues to call a halt upon this kind of business. It is time for the country and those in authority to know that they should not put men upon the retired list in the absence of good and sufficient reasons and put the burden upon the people along these lines. [Applause.]

If you want to economize, here is a place for a little economy. Ever since I have had a seat on this floor I have been in opposition to this sort of a proposition. I would not detract in the slightest degree from the character of the Army of the United States, but I would like to see a bill passed through this House that would take it out of the anomalous condition that it is placed in to-day, where, in effect, a brigadier-general is giving command to major-generals, and giving command to a Lieutenant-General of the Army, when he is commanding a division somewhere in this country. That is an anomalous condition, that the Lieutenant-General is to receive orders from his subordinate, a brigadier-general. We no more need a Lieutenant-General than a cat needs two tails. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, if the chairman of the committee having this matter in charge, my colleague, for whom I have the greatest respect and confidence, says that this motion and the action of the House will embarrass him in standing by this in any way, I am willing, if the House permits, to withdraw it. If not, I ask for the sense of the House upon this question. I do not want to embarrass my colleague or any Member of this House in any way, shape, form, or manner.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], my colleague on the Military Committee, has certainly sprung a surprise upon the committee by his motion. We knew something about the speech, but had no idea that it would come upon the floor until the time came to pass upon this question.

The gentleman from Illinois, in my judgment, had no right to assume that the conferees would agree to an amendment of this kind without first submitting it to the House of Representatives. It is a question that has been thrashed over here in other bills and in other ways until I think both he and the members of the committee largely realize that the House is impatient of this character of legislation, and as the gentleman knows I would have hesitated a long time before consenting to incorporate in the conference report a final agreement which would have deprived the House of the right to pass upon this measure. But if I had known that the gentleman proposed to engage in this kind of legislation, I would have hesitated about taking the time of the House to-day and interfering with the Committee on Naval Affairs. Ordinarily, the House of Representatives permits one conference without instructions. Ordinarily, when we ask for a free conference, we go to the Senate with all matters in dispute to be discussed by the conferees. It is a very rare thing that the House of Representatives in one breath asks for a free conference and in the next breath ties the hands of the conferees on any proposition. The House is never bound. I have known it to turn down conference report after conference report where a single item in the report was not satisfactory to the House. I have had that happen with me on the military bill so often that I am getting cautious about trying it when there is even a doubt about it. So that we could to-day pass a motion for a full and free conference, appoint our conferees, let them go forth and make their report to the House without any danger whatever of any snap judgment being taken upon the membership. Not only that, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PRINCE. Does my colleague yield, just for a moment?

Mr. HULL. Oh, certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. Then I understand my colleague to say that before this matter is finally disposed of opportunity will be given—full, free, frank, and fair opportunity will be given—the House to determine its sense upon this question?

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I said that as far as I was concerned that was my feeling. Now, I feel this way about it: Since this offer has been made here, why, we might just as well pass it as to get up on the floor of the House and say in advance what we are going to do in conference.

Mr. PRINCE. Very well.

Mr. HULL. But I do protest that in courtesy to the Committee on Military Affairs the able member of that committee from Illinois, who has always been conferred with, and whose advice is always sought after and gladly followed when possible, should have taken the members of the committee into his confidence this morning, and have let us know that he proposed to inject this kind of a discussion on the floor of the House.

Mr. KEIFER, Mr. SULZER, and Mr. PRINCE rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio a little later.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, just a few words to say I trust the motion of the gentleman from Illinois will not prevail. As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I desire to say that, in my opinion, it would be inadvisable and unprecedented for the House now to instruct its conferees what to do when they go into conference. It would be practically like a judge telling a jury what to do before the jury hears the testimony. The House, it seems to me, can trust its own conferees. The House can rest assured that its conferees will do their duty, will carry out the will of the House; and if the conferees do not do that, then the House can disagree and instruct the conferees, or appoint new conferees who will carry out the wishes of the House. It seems to me that to do what the gentleman from Illinois requests is to prejudge the whole question and embarrass the conferees on the part of the House, and the chances are that it will preclude the accomplishment of just what the House wants.

The motion, I think, of the gentleman is entirely premature and uncalled for and unnecessary. I think it is a mistake. It should be withdrawn. This is not the proper time to instruct the conferees. I think my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, should withdraw his motion and let this be a free and full and open conference between the Senators and the Members of the House, and then if the conference report is not to the satisfaction of the gentleman he can move a nonconcurrence in the Senate amendment. That will then be the time for him to make a speech about the matter. That will then be the time for the House to determine the question on all the facts and on the merits. I trust that the gentleman from Illinois will not insist on his motion, but withdraw it, and give the conferees appointed by the House an opportunity to go into a free and fair conference without strings of instruction.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that the gentleman from Illinois withdraws his resolution. I think a wrong impression is given by some remarks he has made with reference to the Senate amendment No. 27 to this bill.

The gentleman says that it will provide for the retirement of cadets who served at the Military Academy from 1861 to 1865, or rather during the period of the civil war. I am not by any means certain that under any decision we have had the language of this amendment would be subject to any such construction. The amendment reads in part thus:

> That officers who served creditably during the civil war and who now hold the rank of brigadier-general on the active list of the Army, having previously held that rank for two years or more, shall, when retired from active service, have the rank and retired pay of a major-general.

I think it is clearly meant by this language that they must have served in the Army, and regularly mustered in, other than being mere cadets at the academy.

Mr. HULL. It does not take in any cadets at all.

Mr. KEIFER. That is the claim, and I presume it does not; and, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois is right, this conference committee can take that into account, if they should accede to the substance of the Senate amendment and make it explicit that it does not mean that those who served solely as cadets during the civil war. So much for that. That is a matter that ought to be provided for by the use of proper language, which the conferees can put in if it is a good objection.

The gentleman seems to ignore the fact that an officer would be retired under this clause if he served not only in the civil war, but who would have had two years of active service in the United States Army as a brigadier-general. The officers are not mere accidents that come to be brigadier-generals a few days or weeks or months before their retirement, but they must be officers of this rank who have had two full years on the active list of the United States Army before enforced retirement. No officer is retired absolutely until he is 64 years of age, and then it is not his fault that he is retired at all. It is the fault of the law of the United States, which prohibits his service on the active list a single day after he is 64 years of age. This first became the law, as I recollect, in 1882.

But the eloquent gentleman from Illinois appeals to the House and says that those who served under Washington in the Revolution, those who served in the war of 1812, and those who served in the Mexican war (1846–1848) did not ask to go on the retired list. No, Mr. Speaker, they did not ask to go on the retired list, because they never could get there, and of course they never went there. They served in the Army, in the regular line, to the day of their death, no matter how old they were, and drew full pay. [Applause.] That was the condition exactly. That great old soldier Winfield Scott was about 80 years of age in 1861 and in the civil war, and he was then on the active list drawing full pay. General Scott was born June 13, 1786. There was then no time fixed by law for enforced retirement by reason of age. Congress is responsible for such rule of law. So much for that point.

I think the eminent officers who served in the period of the civil war creditably and who have served their country faithfully forty years or more, meeting all the exigencies of the service, and have had two full years of active service with the high rank of brigadier-general, might well be retired as major-generals for the few remaining years of their life. I am in favor of the principle of this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to a criticism made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] about the present condition of the Army in the United States. Congress very recently passed this system of military organization, and it was done after a great deal of consideration and study. The outline of it was furnished from the War Department and it was acted upon in both Houses and became the law of the land, and it is unfortunate that anyone in the House of Representatives should attempt to teach the people that there is an anomalous and absurd condition growing out of that statute.

The gentleman referred to the fact that a brigadier-general issues orders to a lieutenant-general and to major-generals. But the gentleman omits to state that under the system it is the President of the United States who issues the order. He, as the Commander in Chief, issues his orders through the Chief of Staff by virtue of the statute, and the Chief of Staff by direction of the President issues the order to the superior officers, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois. That same thing happens in all military organizations.

The adjutant of a regiment issues orders to the captains and to the majors and to the lieutenant-colonels. So there is nothing anomalous about it. It is done in every civilized country in the world and it is a part of our military system in the United States which came out of the long consideration and study which the War Department and both Houses of Congress gave to the construction of that statute. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, it is much to be regretted that this question should come up before the House at this time and in exactly this way. It is to be regretted because there may be many Members of the House who are in favor of rejecting the Senate amendment, but who are not in favor of embarrassing the committee by placing them under instructions before they go into a full and free conference. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], who offers the resolution, will not get the full sentiment of the House which may exist against this amendment of the Senate, because a great many Members would vote against this motion simply because it is untimely, and we are likely to get a false impression of the real opinion of the House by voting upon the resolution at this time. Under the circumstances, I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his resolution, and if the gentleman is not willing to do that, then, I think, the only way to bring the matter to a real decision is to move, as I shall, to lay the resolution upon the table. I shall, however, withhold that motion for the present.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, in the military laws of the United States, on page 318, in a footnote, I find the following:

> Before the passing of the act of July 8, 1866, as well as afterwards, the corps of cadets of the Military Academy was a part of the Army of the United States, and a person serving as a cadet was serving in the Army, and the time during which a person has served as a cadet was therefore actual time of service by him in the line of the Army. (Morton v. United States, 112 U. S.)

So there can be no question upon that point, that if this amendment be passed in the shape it is and becomes a law, a cadet at West Point during the war from 1861 to 1865, if he happens to hold a position here in Washington in some of the staff departments as a brigadier-general, by virtue of that becomes a major-general on the retired list. My good friend the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] says they must have had active service for two years or more and have held the rank of brigadier-general. Most of these men who will avail themselves of this law have had active service in the departments here in Washington.

Mr. SULZER. And do they not work pretty hard?

Mr. PRINCE. Work hard, yes; but so do a thousand other men work hard in the clerical departments of this Government who do not receive the pay that these men do. That is no fault of theirs. They are detailed there. If this amendment said "active duty with troops in the field" it would be far different; but it is here in the departments, and it is so worded that it largely affects men here in the departments. It is another evidence of the fact that if you want legislation you must be assigned to duty at Washington, and then you have an opportunity to see to it in such a way that you will get on the retired list; but the poor fellows out on the fighting line, the men that have been retired for wounds received in the line of duty, for sickness, such as second lieutenants, captains, majors, lieutenant-colonels, and colonels, who fought in a thousand engagements from 1861 to 1865, are not considered by this class of legislation.

Now, as to the reflection of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] on the question of the Commander in Chief, I have this to say: Our Commander in Chief, the President of the United States, is an extremely busy man, as we have heard from some of the "hit dogs that yelp," as the expression is, judging from some of the answers they have made to him in which they say that he is looking after all matters from the regulation of the family up to criticising the judges of the United States courts. Now, he is very busy doing his duty under his oath—a splendid executive officer. He can not possibly know of these various orders. Under him is the Secretary of War, who is busy with the Panama Canal, with the Philippine affairs, and with the great affairs of this country. Resolve it right down, and what have you? A brigadier-general as Chief of Staff, giving orders to major-generals and to the Lieutenant-General of the Army. I make no reflection upon the Army. It is a splendid Army, made up of splendid men and well officered, but what I said stands out yet as a truth—that from the firing of the first shot at Lexington down to the firing of the first shot at Fort Sumter there was no retired list in the Army of this country. The splendid men who have gone before were not here, as men now are, seeking to be put upon the retired list, not for the glory of it, but for the pay of it, and we have sixty-four brigadier-generals to-day on the retired list who served but one day as brigadier-generals. What a condition it presents to our country! I am opposed to it, but if the gentleman thinks it will embarrass the committee in any way, then I shall content myself with the knowledge that I have sounded the note of warning. I have been assured by gentlemen, my colleagues on the committee, that they will give the House an opportunity to be heard at the proper time.

Now, as to the criticism of my colleague. I gave notice in the committee that on the floor of the House I would object to this amendment, that I would resist it to the end; and I shall do it, if I am permitted, on the floor of the House, and if my people in my district approve of it, I shall come back, and if they are opposed to my doing this I shall stay at home; but I want the entire country to know how we are legislating here, passing personal legislation for six or seven men, to make of them major-generals for services—good, it is true, but not within a thousand points as good as that of 10,000 men who are to-day drawing a pension of $6 or $8 or $10 a month.

Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, I will withdraw the resolution. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LITTLEFIELD). The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his motion, and if there be no objection, the Speaker pro tempore will appoint the following conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HULL of Iowa, Mr. CAPRON of Rhode Island, and Mr. SULZER of New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. Foss, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18750—the naval appropriation bill—Mr. CRUMPACKER in the chair.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on page 3, beginning at line 21, the following: "Provided, That hereafter, in cases where orders for travel are given to officers of the Navy or the Marine Corps, the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, may direct that either mileage or else their actual and necessary expenses only shall be allowed," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That hereafter, in cases where orders for travel are given to officers of the Navy or Marine Corps, no mileage shall be allowed, but that such officers shall be paid their actual and necessary expenses."

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that. We have passed that section already.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. FOSS. But I will reserve the point of order if the gentleman desires to say something.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. I will state now if the gentleman makes the point of order against that amendment, then I shall make the point of order against the three lines.

Mr. Chairman, the paragraph which I have moved to strike out, on the bottom of page 3, certainly might give rise to favoritism. Why should one officer be allowed mileage and another officer his "actual and necessary traveling expenses only?" As everybody knows, the mileage that is allowed under the present law is very much greater than the actual and necessary traveling expenses.

Certainly there should be no favoritism as between officers of the Navy. If one officer is entitled to mileage when traveling under orders, then all officers ought to be allowed mileage. One of the first principles of the Army and Navy is that all the officers are accorded equal privileges. No officer because he may have some special political "pull" or be a favorite of the Department, or have some friend in power, should be allowed, for any of those reasons, to have favors over and above other officers who may not be so fortunately situated. The provision in the bill at the bottom of page 3 lets down the bars and gives an unlimited opportunity for special privilege to some of the officers.

As everybody knows, the Secretary of the Navy does not give his personal attention to such small matters as this. There will be hundreds of officers who will travel. Their accounts are not settled by the Secretary of the Navy himself, but rather by some clerk specially designated for that purpose. Now, that clerk, whoever he may be, by this provision is given a whip which he may hold over all of the officers of the Navy. The discretion which is given by this paragraph to the Secretary of the Navy will, as a matter of fact, be exercised entirely, completely, and in every instance by some clerk in the Department, and will not be exercised in any case by the Secretary of the Navy himself.

Now, suppose that a certain officer of the Navy must travel under orders. Of course he will want to be allowed Government mileage rather than his actual expenses; that will be natural because his mileage as allowed by law is much greater than his actual expenses. He must then go to this clerk and humbly bow and say, "Mr. Clerk, please allow me to have mileage instead of my actual expenses." And all the officers of the Navy will have to do the same.

It is easy to see that this clerk will be placed in a position where, if he sees fit, he may exercise a petty tyranny over these officers. He will be in the position of handing out to them favors, if he sees fit, and if he does not see fit, to withhold these favors. Every officer to whom he allows mileage instead of actual expenses will certainly be under obligations to him just as much as if he had presented him with so much money, and our experience with mankind leads us to believe that most of the clerks will want favors from the officers in return.

There is a "little joker" in those three or four lines that might be passed over unless examined with care.

Certainly that clause giving the discretion is unnecessary and improper. The discretion would only be exercised against some officer who did not stand in the good graces of the clerk holding this discretionary power. And besides, why should the discretion be exercised? Where would the line be drawn, and why should there be a rule for one that does not apply to all? Sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander in this case. If an officer is traveling under orders, he should be allowed exactly what other officers get, and some of them should not be allowed more than others.

But, Mr. Chairman, my idea is that this mileage should be done away with entirely. Why should a mileage be allowed? Why not pay the actual expenses and stop there?

The officers of our Navy are well paid; better paid, Mr. Chairman, than the officers of any other navy in the world. They occupy an easy, enviable position with comparatively little to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. If their pay is not sufficient, then let us raise it.

Mr. Chairman, there is scarcely an officer in the Navy who is not glad of the opportunity of traveling at the Government's expense. His pay for his time goes on just the same, and when he is allowed to see the world, or to travel, at the Government's expense, he is certainly glad to do so, as anybody else would be; and he certainly ought to be satisfied at having his actual expenses paid. Now, since he would be glad of the opportunity of traveling and having his expenses paid by the Government, why should a bonus in addition thereto be given? Officers who are fortunate enough to be detailed to travel under orders and have their expenses paid should not, in addition thereto, be given an extra sum.

A great deal of abuse has grown out of this mileage business. We find officers riding on passes and not only getting their expenses, but mileage in addition. It runs into a large sum of money, which ought to be curtailed.

As an illustration of the abuse of this system, we find Gen. Leonard Wood, who recently went from the Philippine Islands for his health to the city of Boston to get special surgical advice and assistance, attempting to charge the Government of the United States mileage clear around the world, as he went from the Philippine Islands via one route and went back around the world on the other side. Thirty-six hundred dollars he charged, although I am informed that he rode a large part of the distance free on a Government ship, while all that time he was drawing a large salary from the Government, although he was not going on official business, as far as my information goes, but simply for medical treatment for himself. Now, what the necessity of his going to Boston for medical treatment was I do not know. I am informed that the hospitals and physicians of the city of Manila are among the best in the world. Of this sum of $3,600 charged, I am informed that $1,100 was allowed, and that sum, as we all know, is a much larger sum than "actual traveling expenses" from the Philippine Islands.

Mr. Chairman, this is only one instance. There is no end to the graft that has been perpetrated on the Government by officers traveling under this mileage system. We have been told of many instances where officers in traveling between two points went long distances out of their route and charged the Government mileage for the same—very much as Gen. Leonard Wood did when he traveled around the world.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal at this session about economy. We have seen attempts made to curtail in this direction and in that, and now here is a splendid opportunity for economy. Here is a chance, Mr. Chairman, where we can not only exercise economy, but where we can put a stop to a large amount of graft that has been going on year after year.

I offer the amendment, Mr. Chairman. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon my point of order; first, that the section has been passed, and, second, that it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair understand the gentleman from Illinois. The amendment is a substitute for the proviso contained in the paragraph. The proviso itself appears to be new legislation. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if that is true?

Mr. FOSS. It is.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. That being the case, the only question in relation to this amendment would be, Is it germane? Because the rule is, where a bill contains new legislation and no objection is made to it, it may be amended by anything that is germane to the subject contained in the paragraph. The Chair is of the opinion that this amendment is in order, because it is germane to the proviso.

Mr. FOSS. What does the Chair say to my first point of order, that we had passed the section?

The CHAIRMAN. The section had not been passed. The committee rose on the previous day immediately after the paragraph was read, and a paragraph is not passed for purposes of amendment until the reading of the next one is entered upon. So the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I have only a word to say, and that is, I trust that this amendment will be voted down. The provision which is inserted in this bill was a provision that was recommended by the Secretary of the Navy and received the unanimous support of the Committee on Naval Affairs, both on that side of the House and upon this. I would call for a vote.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard just for a moment on this amendment. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the old law provided for mileage to the officer, and the amendment provides, in the discretion of the Secretary, he may have his actual expenses. The reason for the amendment grew out of some cases in which the officer had not been paid his actual expenses. One of these officers was a constituent of mine. He was detailed for recruiting duty, and his service was in several cities in the West, very close to each other. The mileage practically amounted to nothing to this officer on this recruiting duty. He had to stay for a considerable length of time in the cities in the discharge of his duty, the result being that his hotel bills and other proper expenses were more than the sum of his mileage. There can be no question, therefore, to my mind, but that it is justice to the officer himself that the Secretary of the Navy shall have the discretion, where the mileage does not pay the actual expenses, to allow these actual expenses in place of mileage. The officer is there on special duty; the mileage does not pay his actual expenses; and this amendment simply authorizes the Secretary, in a proper case, to allow the actual expenses in place of the mileage. I believe under ordinary circumstances the mileage system is probably the best, as it saves a great deal of trouble at the Department, but I know, as stated, of one instance where the actual expenses exceeded the mileage by two or three hundred dollars in two or three months' services.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 45.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the section beginning with line 21, that it is new legislation.

Mr. FOSS. The point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. It comes too late.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, some statements made during the debate on this bill impel me to discuss the relative cost of building naval vessels in navy-yards and in private establishments, as shown by the reports regarding the Connecticut and the Louisiana.

During the Fifty-sixth Congress I urged the initiation of the policy of utilizing the navy-yards for construction purposes. The agitation then began continued until in the act making appropriations for the naval service, approved July 1, 1902, the Secretary of the Navy was directed to build one of the battle ships authorized in that act in such navy-yard as he designated.

Two battle ships were authorized in that act, since named Connecticut and Louisiana. They were to carry the heaviest armor of their class upon a trial displacement of not more than 16,000 tons, and to have the highest practical speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $4,212,000 each. The navy-yard at Brooklyn, N. Y., was designated by the Secretary of the Navy as the place for the construction of the vessel to be built at a navy-yard.

In order that Congress might know definitely the cost of construction at navy-yards and by contract the act contained the following provision:

> The Secretary of the Navy is hereby instructed to keep an accurate account of the cost of inspection and construction of vessels provided for in this act, whether built in Government yards or by contract, and report thereon to Congress, at each session, the progress of the work and cost thereof, including the inspection of all material going into the construction of said vessels, and, upon the completion thereof, to report a full and detailed statement showing the relative cost of inspection and construction in Government yards and by contract.

The Navy Department selected September 30 of each year as the date upon which the accounts of the two vessels should be made up for transmission thereafter as speedily as possible to Congress.

HOW ACCOUNT OF COST MADE UP.

The scheme adopted for making up the cost accounts, as stated by the Secretary of the Navy in a communication addressed to the Speaker of the House, under date of December 29, 1902, and found in House Document No. 235, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session, was intended to include the pay and allowances of all officers of the Navy as well as all employees exclusively employed upon the inspection or construction of these vessels, and also a portion of the pay and allowances of all officers employed at the shipyards and navy-yards or on inspection duties, a portion of whose time is given to these vessels, among others, under construction.

In making up the cost of the Connecticut, the vessel being built in the navy-yard, part of the maintenance charges of the yard are charged to the cost of the Connecticut.

As the Secretary of the Navy said in the document just mentioned:

> In making up the final cost of the Connecticut, building in the navy-yard, New York, the Department intends to include a proper charge for the use of the existing facilities of Government property in the way of building slip, buildings, machinery, wharves, dry docks, etc., which are unquestionably a portion of the actual cost of production, and as similar charges undoubtedly enter, in some measure, into the cost of contract-built vessels.

As a matter of fact, these charges would be incurred regardless of whether the facilities of the yard were utilized for construction purposes.

LOUISIANA CONTRACT.

The contract for the construction of the Louisiana was made with the Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company, at the stipulated price of $3,990,000. The contract is dated October 15, 1902, and the contract period of construction is forty-one months.

The building of these sister ships, one by contract, the other in a Government yard, has been regarded as a test of the merits of the two systems, and has been keenly followed by everybody interested in naval shipbuilding.

The Newport News company had considerable advantage at the outset. It had built battle ships prior to its contract for the Louisiana. It had a well-equipped plant and all the facilities required for such work, while the navy-yard selected had not constructed a vessel of any kind in about fifteen years and was not fully equipped for the test. This necessitated the installation of equipment, which took time, that was utilized by the Newport News company in actual work on the Louisiana.

ADVANTAGES CLAIMED FOR CONSTRUCTION AT NAVY-YARDS.

It may be well to recall at this time the advantages claimed at the time the building of a battle ship at a navy-yard was authorized by those who favored the policy.

It was urged that the Government would thus have a check upon the contractor and be able to prevent extortionate charges; that a trained force of mechanics would be assembled, competent to undertake any work the Government desired done; that the navy-yards would be equipped so as to enable work of any character to be done therein, so that in the time of emergency the Government would not be at the mercy of private concerns; that a basis of comparison would be established whereby the Government could ascertain whether the work of the contractors was up to the desired standard, and that by the continued employment, assured by a certain amount of work always at hand, the skilled force of mechanics and the organization of the yard could be easily and economically maintained.

These reasons are repeated at this time since those who opposed the policy at the beginning are attempting to disparage the work on the Connecticut by emphatic declarations that the cost of the navy-yard work is greatly in excess of the work done by contract.

RESULT OF POLICY THUS FAR KNOWN.

What has resulted from the initiation of this policy? Has any excess of cost, if any, of the building in a navy-yard been offset by other advantages? Handicapped as it was at the outset, yet the navy-yard has set such a rapid pace that the result has been the fastest construction known in the history of naval shipbuilding in this country. I call attention to the following statement taken from the report of the Hon. Victor H. Metcalf, Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor, in response to a resolution of the Committee on Labor of the House of Representatives, April 13, 1904, from which it appears that in elapsed time the work of the Newport News Company on the Louisiana, with far greater displacement, surpasses that of all others, with the Connecticut only two days behind. To be more specific, the keel of the Louisiana was laid February 7, 1903, and the ship was launched August 27, 1904. Five hundred and sixty-eight days elapsed from the laying of the keel to the date of launching. The keel of the Connecticut was laid March 10, 1903, and the launching was September 29, 1904, a period of five hundred and seventy days intervening. The displacement of these two vessels is 16,000 tons each. When the Louisiana was launched 54.5 per cent of its hull work had been completed; the Connecticut, 53.59 per cent.

The significance of these figures rests in the fact that the elapsed time between the days on which the keels were laid and the vessels launched was shorter than the time between similar dates in the construction of fifteen other first-class battle ships, although all of the fifteen were vessels of lesser displacement. But one first-class battle ship has been launched in quicker time; that was the Alabama, a vessel of 11,565 tons displacement, as compared with the 16,000 tons of the Connecticut and Louisiana. The time elapsing between the laying of the keel of the Alabama and its launching was five hundred and thirty-three days—almost as long as the Louisiana—and yet the Alabama was not completed until twelve months and twenty-seven days beyond the time fixed in the contract.

NAVY-YARD DEMONSTRATES THAT SHIPS CAN BE BUILT WITHIN CONTRACT TIME.

Thus the first notable result of navy-yard construction is the demonstration that naval vessels can be constructed within the time fixed in the contracts if the Government work be not subordinated to other work. My colleague [Mr. CALDER] has submitted a list of sixty-eight naval vessels constructed by contract which were delayed beyond the contract time from one to thirty-nine months. He also submitted a list of twelve battle ships now under construction in private yards, eight of which will not be completed within the time fixed by the contracts, and four of which, it is estimated, will be completed within the contract period. If the past be a fair criterion, however, of what the future will bring forth, it is a safe hazard that none of these vessels will be finished within the time fixed in the contracts.

CONNECTICUT NOT FINISHED WITHIN TIME LIMIT BECAUSE OF DELAYED DELIVERIES OF ARMOR.

The vessels to which I have referred by no means exhausted the list of those delayed beyond the time fixed for their completion. Indeed, with the exception of a few small boats, no vessel for the Navy has ever been completed within the time allotted.

It is true that it is estimated that the Connecticut will be delayed about four months beyond the time fixed for completion, but that can not be charged to the navy-yard, the employees, or the officers in charge of the work. It is due entirely to the failure of the armor-plate manufacturers to supply the armor required as speedily as it should have been furnished. This assertion is sustained by the responses made by the Navy Department to two resolutions of inquiry introduced by me, one on January 31, 1905, in the third session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, and one on January 15, 1906, the present session of the Fifty-ninth Congress.

The Chief Constructor of the Navy, in his report for the last fiscal year (see p. 538, Annual Reports of the Navy Department for 1905), says:

Work on the U. S. S. Connecticut is progressing very satisfactorily, and but for delays in the delivery of armor it is more than probable that this vessel would have been completed within the contract time, in which case it would have been the first battle ship to have been completed within the contract time of completion since the reconstruction of the Navy began, in 1883.

To place where it may be available to all interested in this question, I shall read from the letter of the Chief Constructor, dated February 8, 1906, transmitted to the House by the Secretary of the Navy in response to the latest resolution of inquiry which I introduced on this subject. The complete response is found in House Document No. 510, first session Fifty-ninth Congress, of which the following are extracts:

* * * The first actual delivery of armor for the Connecticut was January 9, 1904, and for the Louisiana, October 16, 1903. On May 27, 1904, this Bureau was informed by the naval constructor at the navy-yard, New York, that the Carnegie Steel Company had informed him by letter that they were unable to state, even within a reasonable time, as to when the armor for the Connecticut might be expected, and the naval constructor stated that the condition of the work on the Connecticut was such as to render it liable to be delayed unless the armor was delivered at or near the dates mentioned.

* * * * * * *

This information was furnished the Bureau of Ordnance.

Referring to item (a), it is noted that the 8-inch barbettes and tubes were delivered for the Connecticut between November 23, 1904, and February 8, 1905, and for the Louisiana between November 11, 1903, and September 10, 1904. The 12-inch barbette lower plates were delivered for the Connecticut in August, 1904, and October, 1904, and for the Louisiana during October, 1903.

Referring to item (b), conning-tower tubes for the Connecticut were delivered in July, 1904, and for the Louisiana during the same month. The 12-inch barbette upper plates were delivered for the Connecticut December, 1904, and January, 1905, and for the Louisiana during October, 1903.

Referring to item (c), the side-belt armor for the Connecticut was delivered between February, 1905, and September, 1905, and for the Louisiana between March, 1904, and September, 1904.

Referring to item (d), the lower casemate armor for the Connecticut was delivered during March, 1905, and for the Louisiana during May, 1904.

Referring to item (e), upper-casemate armor, 8-inch barbettes, and 12-inch and 8-inch turret armor for the Connecticut was delivered between February, 1905, and the present date, a considerable part of the turret armor not yet being received, and for the Louisiana between November, 1903, and the present date, practically all of which has been received.

In September, 1904, the naval constructor invited particular attention to the absolute necessity for early delivery of the armor and stated that a recent inspection of the Louisiana indicated that all her 8-inch and 12-inch lower barbettes, conning tower, and a considerable amount of belt armor had been received, and by way of comparison stated that none of the above had been received for the Connecticut. A table was inclosed with this letter indicating the comparative condition of armor installation and receipt. This letter was referred to the Bureau of Ordnance September 14, 1904.

On October 7 the naval constructor invited attention to the fact that the Connecticut was launched with considerably less armor than the Louisiana, owing to its not being in the yard, and urged the necessity of the early delivery of the Connecticut's armor. This letter was referred to the Bureau of Ordnance with request that it expedite the delivery of the armor, so that the delivery should be equal in character and quantity for the Connecticut and Louisiana.

The naval constructor on August 29, 1905, commented on the work in the turrets and stated that unless the turret armor was delivered before the middle of next winter—i. e., about January, 1906—the final completion of the vessel would be delayed. This letter was referred to the Bureau of Ordnance, and it stated that the Bethlehem Steel Company had been instructed to give no preference in the matter of delivery of the turrets of the Louisiana and Connecticut. However, the Louisiana's turrets were delivered between November, 1905, and the present data, and the Connecticut's are practically undelivered at the present time.

The naval constructor, on December 26, 1905, called attention to the nondelivery of the turret armor, which letter was referred to the Bureau of Ordnance and returned, stating that the Connecticut's turret armor would be delivered before the end of February, 1906.

The monthly progress reports of the Connecticut for September, 1904, stated the nondelivery of armor as a cause for delay in the completion of the vessel. This was referred to the Bureau of Ordnance, and that Bureau stated that it had exhausted all practicable means to hasten the delivery of the armor for this vessel without very seriously interfering with the delivery of armor urgently needed for other vessels.

It may be noted in this connection that all armor plans were completed for Louisiana and sent to the Bureau of Ordnance in June, 1903, and Connecticut in July of the same year.

No one can read these extracts without realizing the tremendous handicap the navy-yard has been under in the contest with the contractor, and it is emphasized from this additional extract from the same report:

1. The ship contractors, on August 25, 1905, stated that the turret work was being delayed by the nonreceipt of armor for this vessel. This letter was referred to the Bureau of Ordnance, and the armor has since been delivered, between October 20 and the present date.

2. In the progress report for this vessel up to November, 1905, no delay was attributed to the nondelivery of armor. The ship contractors, however, in their letter referred to above, made claim for delay, owing to nondelivery of turret armor. There is no other record of delay claimed by the contractor for the Louisiana or attributed by the superintending constructor to nondelivery of armor.

Neither the Connecticut nor the Louisiana is yet completed, but it is expected that they will be shortly.

VIRGINIA, JUST COMPLETED BY NEWPORT NEWS COMPANY, TWO YEARS OVERDUE.

At this point let me call attention to the fact, so well stated the other day by the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], that the Virginia, a first-class battle ship built by the same company that is building the Louisiana, only turned over to the Government within the past few weeks, was more than two years behind the time fixed for completion. For more than two years the Government has had invested in the neighborhood of $3,000,000 unable to derive benefit therefrom. At the rate paid by the Government for money—2 per cent—this means, in effect, that the Virginia has practically cost the Government $120,000 in interest which will never be counted in its cost.

Of course penalties are fixed in the contract for such delays. If I recall correctly, $300 a day for the first six months that the vessel is delayed beyond the contract time and $600 a day thereafter. But such penalty clauses do not promise much, since they have never been enforced.

INCREASE IN LIMIT OF COST FOR CONNECTICUT.

The Naval Committee recommends that the limit of cost of the Connecticut be increased from $4,212,000 to $4,600,000. This recommendation is based upon the request of the Chief Constructor. The chairman of the committee [Mr. Foss] admitted in reply to an inquiry made by me that the committee had not obtained a detailed statement as to the necessity for this increase. As I have been unable to obtain a copy of the testimony of the Chief Constructor I am unable to state upon what his request is based.

I am informed, however, that it is not claimed that the entire $4,600,000 will be required to complete the Connecticut, but that such a sum will be ample beyond all question. So that the hull and machinery of the Connecticut will be completed within the sum of $4,600,000, which includes, as I have already pointed out, charges for the use of the facilities of the navy-yard, including the building slip, buildings, machinery, wharves, dry docks, etc. In other words, part of the maintenance charges of the navy-yard are charged to the cost of the Connecticut.

COST OF LOUISIANA STILL UNCERTAIN.

But what of the cost of the Louisiana? Until it is completed the cost can not be definitely ascertained. The contract price is $3,990,000. Under date of February 19, 1906, in response to a resolution of inquiry which I introduced in this House, the Secretary of the Navy reported that certain modifications and alterations in the plans of the Louisiana cost $132,986, while similar work on the Connecticut cost $112,009; and this difference is further emphasized from the fact that certain additional work required on the Connecticut and not on the Louisiana added $4,791 to the cost of the Connecticut and saved $6,800 on the Louisiana.

Taking the contract price of the Louisiana, $3,990,000, and the cost of alterations made up to February 9, 1906, the date to which they were estimated, to wit, $132,986, the cost of the Louisiana is brought up to $4,122,986.

NEWPORT NEWS COMPANY RELEASED FROM CERTAIN WORK.

More than that, I desire to call specific attention to the fact that in response to a resolution introduced by me on January 15, 1906, it appears that the Navy Department has released the Newport News Shipbuilding Company, under certain contingencies, from the obligation of doing certain work required by the contract. So that there may be no questions raised as to the accuracy of this statement, I shall read from the report of the Chief Constructor, dated February 8, 1906, transmitted by the Secretary of the Navy to the House on February 12, 1906, and found in House Document No. 510, first session Fifty-ninth Congress:

On November 21, 1905, the contractors called attention to the nondelivery of the 12-inch guns. The Bureau of Ordnance stated in reply that the gun factory had been directed to expedite the delivery. On January 5, 1906, the contractors called attention to the nondelivery of turret-elevating motors for 12-inch and 8-inch turrets. Upon reference to the Department via the Bureau of Ordnance the Department approved the recommendation of this Bureau that the contractors be not required to install the above if not delivered at the contractors' works prior to the expiration of the contract period, provided the vessel is otherwise completed under the terms of the contract.

In their letter of December 28, 1905, the contractors submitted formal claim for extension of the contract time, due to nondelivery of 12-inch guns, the Bureau of Ordnance having stated that the last pair of these guns would not be ready for proof before February or March, 1906. This Bureau therefore recommended to the Department that the contractors be not required to install these guns provided the ship was otherwise completed on the expiration of the contract time, which recommendation was approved.

It also appears from the foregoing that the Government has taken suitable steps to prevent such delays on the Louisiana operating to the detriment of the contractors, the Government in this instance releasing the contractor from such work of installation of armament and accessories as would otherwise delay the delivery of the vessel after completion of all other work required by the terms of the contract.

Until this ship is delivered to the Government, and it is definitely ascertained whether the Government must do work originally required of the contractor, and from which it may be released, and what it will cost to do this work, the final cost of the Louisiana can not be accurately stated, and no comparison with the cost of the Connecticut, yet undetermined, can be made.

But there is even more to be taken into account when the statement of the final cost of the Louisiana is prepared. The figures thus far given, to wit, $4,122,986, include only the contract price and the cost of alteration up to February 9, 1906. There are many other elements of cost, however, which must be included in the account. As stated by the Secretary of the Navy in his communication to the Speaker of the House, under date of December 29, 1902 (H. Doc. No. 235, 57th Cong., 2d sess.):

The scheme adopted for making up these cost accounts is intended to include the pay and allowances of all officers of the Navy as well as all employees exclusively employed upon the inspection or construction of these vessels, and also a portion of the pay and allowances of all officers employed at the shipyards and navy-yards or on inspection duties a portion of whose time is given to these vessels among others under construction.

So that these additional expenses must be added to the contract price—the cost of alterations, the cost, if any, of doing work from which the contractor has been released, and some other expenses, not inconsiderable charges, to which I shall now refer.

The latest statement of expenditures submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Navy, under the provisions of the act of July 2, 1902, is dated February 7, 1906, and is contained in House Document No. 478, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.

I have examined that statement with the utmost care, and I challenge any Member of this House to point out the expenditures therein stated to have been made on the Louisiana, which were made under the provisions of the contract, and those which are made in addition to the terms of the contract. One item of $18,979.35, under the title "Cost of inspection at works of contractors," is clearly in addition to the contract price, and it is the only item that can be so segregated. Where are the other charges buried?

In Senate Document No. 175, first session Fifty-seventh Congress, entitled "Letter from the Secretary of the Navy, showing the amounts authorized for new vessels under 'Increase of the Navy' in each act of Congress since and including the act of March 3, 1883, in response to Senate resolution of February 21, 1901," there is information that suggests the question that I ask.

I find in that document, and as the letter is dated February 7, 1902, it has no data upon the two ships now the subject of discussion, that the plans, etc., for the first-class battle ship Alabama, of 11,565 tons displacement, cost $113,739.43. These figures and those that follow include the expense to both the Bureau of Construction and Repair and to the Bureau of Steam Engineering. The first-class battle ship Illinois, 11,565 tons, $77,611.06; the Indiana, 10,288 tons, $74,899.64; the Iowa, 11,340 tons, $75,168.87; the Kearsarge, 11,540 tons, $108,597.90; the Kentucky, 11,540 tons, $106,962.77; the Missouri, 12,240 tons, $26,984.50.

Some of the vessels appear to have had comparatively small amounts spent for such purposes, but whether that is due to the fact that the plans of previously authorized vessels had been used, or that such vessels had not reached such a stage of completion, being practically just begun, I am unable to say. The fact is, however, that large expenditures are made for such purposes, and the probability is that a large sum in addition to the contract price of the Louisiana must be expended.

The contract price is	$3,990,000.00
Alterations to February 9, 1906	132,986.00
Inspection at works of contractors	18,979.35
Total expenditures possible to estimate definitely from data at hand	4,141,965.35
Limit of cost	4,212,000.00
Available for all other purposes	70,034.65

This merely demonstrates that until the vessels are completed and the accounts accurately and definitely cast, that it does not lie with anyone to assert that the cost of the Connecticut will be any appreciable amount greater than that of the Louisiana.

EIGHT-HOUR DAY IN NAVY-YARDS ADVANTAGEOUS TO GOVERNMENT.

That was the chief purpose I had in speaking upon this bill. One other phase of the question I desire to refer to briefly before I conclude.

It is continuously asserted that the cost of building in Government yards is increased because an eight-hour day prevails there against a nine-hour day in private yards. The chairman of the Naval Committee asserted that the committee's recommendation for increasing the limit of cost of the Connecticut and the two colliers authorized by the act of April 27, 1904, was due practically entirely to the increased cost of building in navy-yards.

The gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] has conclusively shown that the increased cost of the colliers is due to the elaborate changes and alteration made in the plans since the original estimate was made. The result is that vessels never in contemplation when the estimate was made have been planned. The Chief Constructor in his report for the fiscal year 1905, speaking of the recommendation, does not base it upon the increased cost of construction in navy-yards. He says:

Since the construction of the Prometheus and Vestal at navy-yards is mandatory, and since the original estimates for these vessels contemplated building by contract, at the comparatively low rates then prevailing, and since their construction at navy-yards under present conditions can not be completed without exceeding the limit of cost, it is recommended that Congress be requested to extend the limit of cost of each of these vessels to $1,550,000.

The Chief Constructor, however, is one of those who continually assert that the cost of construction in navy-yards is greater because of the eight-hour day that prevails there.

He says in his report for 1905:

In this connection the Bureau desires to invite attention to the following extract from its last annual report in reference to the desirability and cost of building vessels in Government yards:

"Although every possible precaution is being taken to reduce the cost of the Connecticut to the most economical basis, it can hardly be hoped that the work will be done as cheaply as when performed in private shipbuilding yards, whose rates of pay for nine hours' work are in many cases less than those being paid for eight hours' work at the navy-yard, New York. It may also be noted that private shipyards do not pay their "per diem" employees for holidays or when on leave, whereas a very large proportion of the "per diem" employees on the Connecticut receive pay for fifteen days' leave and seven public holidays during the calendar year without any work being done in return therefor.

"One of the principal objects to be attained in the building of vessels in Government yards is the maintenance of the organization of the yard and the provision of suitable work for experienced mechanics during the absence of the fleet. * * *"

Mr. Chairman, it has been conclusively demonstrated that the Government suffers no inconvenience nor disadvantage from its eight-hour day. In fact, the mechanics employed on the Connecticut have done one-tenth more work in eight hours than the mechanics employed on the Louisiana have done in nine hours. This is no idle boast. It is not the invention of my imagination. It is the deliberate conclusion of the Department of Commerce and Labor, after an investigation directed by a committee of this House. After a thorough investigation it reported "that the average production per man per hour on the Connecticut exceeded by 24.48 per cent the average production per man per hour on the Louisiana, which explains why the progress on the Connecticut, as shown in the reports of percentage of work completed to the Bureau of Construction and Repair, has kept pace with the percentage reports of the work completed on the Louisiana."

This means that practically a man on the Connecticut has done as much in eight hours as would take the mechanic on the Louisiana to do in ten hours, so that, I repeat, the navy-yard employees have done in eight hours one-tenth more work than the mechanics on the Louisiana in nine hours.

COMPARISON OF COST OF BUILDING HERE AND IN ENGLAND.

It has been frequently asserted that vessels of all kinds are built much more cheaply in England than in this country. For that reason I desire to insert here, as of special interest, a table giving certain comparative data in regard to the U. S. battle ship Connecticut and His Majesty's battle ship King Edward VII, the figures for the latter being taken from the 1905 copy of Brassey's Naval Annual.

From this table it will be seen that in size, armor, armament, speed, type of machinery and boilers, and other features that go to make up offensive and defensive qualities, and which affect the cost of the two vessels in a like manner, the Connecticut and the King Edward VII compare very closely. The cost of the latter, as given in an article by Sir William White, late chief constructor of the British admiralty (as outlined in the February 23d number of London Engineering), is as follows (exclusive of armor and guns): Hull, £400,000; gun mountings, mechanism, etc., £200,000; machinery, £200,000; incidental dock-yard charges, £90,000; total of above, £890,000 (about $4,331,000). The limit cost as set by Congress for the Connecticut (exclusive of armor and armament) is $4,212,000; it will thus be seen that this limit of cost does not equal the cost of the King Edward VII by $119,000.

RESULTS JUSTIFY CONTINUANCE OF NAVY-YARD CONSTRUCTION.

The results thus far attained in the contest between the navy-yard and the private yard demonstrate the wisdom of limited construction at navy-yards.

The navy-yard has been severely handicapped in the test. I might recall that extraordinary action taken by the Department at a critical time. With so much depending upon the issue, it was the duty of those in charge of the Government interests to be especially careful in what was done. And yet, when the Connecticut was about half completed, the constructor in immediate charge of the work was transferred and another put in his place. I do not say a less able man, but certainly one lacking in that particular and minute knowledge of the work under way possessed by the officer transferred.

Despite the keen rivalry between the navy-yard and the private yard, the constructor in charge at the Brooklyn yard, against the protests of his subordinates, never hesitated to shift mechanics from the Connecticut to the ordinary repair work of the yard. And yet, although, as I am reliably informed, the Newport News Company worked its men overtime and exerted every energy on the Louisiana, and although the delays of armor deliveries were a severe handicap, the vessels are practically at the same stage of completion.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, this policy of navy-yard construction should be continued. A short time ago I urged the Secretary of the Navy to direct the officials of the navy-yards to submit bids upon new vessels in competition with private builders, but without results so far. This plan was tried some years ago in California on certain repair work, and the navy-yard not only underbid the contractors, but did the work for less than the estimate.

To have direct competition between the navy-yards and private yards would be of undoubted benefit to the Government. Even the opponents of navy-yard construction could not fairly object to this plan. It would result in better prices for the Government, better ships for the Navy, and, in my judgment, a fuller use of the facilities of the Government yards.

The navy-yard, in the pending contest, has justified every claim made on behalf of the policy of limited construction in navy-yards, and the welfare of the country demands that the policy be not abandoned as its fruits are about to be gathered. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent, Navy: For all emergencies and extraordinary expenses, exclusive of personal services in the Navy Department, or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices at Washington, D. C., arising at home or abroad, but impossible to be anticipated or classified, to be expended on the approval and authority of the Secretary of the Navy, and for such purposes as he may deem proper, $65,000: Provided, That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow, in the settlement of accounts of disbursing officers involved, payments made under the appropriation "Contingent, Navy," to civilian employees appointed by the Navy Department for duty in and serving at naval stations maintained in the island possessions during the fiscal year 1907: And provided further, That a sum not to exceed $5,000 may be expended by the Secretary of the Navy for legal advice out of this appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. I reserve the point of order against the proviso, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question in regard to that proviso. The Navy Department has a Judge-Advocate-General, and in addition to that a solicitor, and I am unable to understand why it is necessary to appropriate $5,000 to be expended for legal advice, or legal advice in addition to that which the Secretary of the Navy may now obtain from the Judge-Advocate-General and from the Solicitor of the Navy Department.

Mr. FOSS. I will state to the gentleman that the Secretary of the Navy especially requested that of this contingent fund of the Navy $5,000 might be expended for legal advice. It is true that the Navy Department has a corps, presided over by the Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy, but he is not a civil lawyer. He is an officer of the Navy, and he supervises military justice.

Mr. TAWNEY. In addition to the Judge-Advocate-General, if I may interrupt the gentleman, they have a solicitor, or legal officer of the Navy Department, independent of the Attorney-General's Office, which by law is an office to which the Secretary of the Navy may apply, and to which he has very frequently in the past applied, for legal advice and counsel in respect to any legal question which may arise in the administration of his Department. I speak of this, because this proposition looks to me as if it is simply for the purpose of creating a place for some other officer under the guise of legal advice.

Mr. FOSS. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that certain Departments of the Government have assistant attorney-generals, specially delegated to them—for instance, the Post-Office Department and the Interior Department, but in the case of the Navy Department there is no such officer who is especially charged to and who is especially delegated and assigned to the Navy Department.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me? The Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy is assigned to the Navy Department, and is supposed to be peculiarly fitted for giving any advice that the Secretary of the Navy may require in the administration of the Department, and in addition to that——

Mr. FOSS. The gentleman, I feel sure, is mistaken about that. The Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy is an officer of the Navy.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand.

Mr. FOSS. He is no lawyer whatever, but simply looks after military justice.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am afraid that the gentleman is not stating quite the fact about that.

Mr. FOSS. That is absolutely true. That is what the Secretary says in his hearing. He says:

> While the very necessity of the case has caused that work to be thrown on the office of the Judge-Advocate-General, it was not originally organized with any such idea, but was organized to supervise military justice.

And then he says "he could have just asked the opinion of the Attorney-General, but it is a very cumbersome process," and there is no special officer from the Department of Justice delegated to the Navy to perform this work.

Now, as to creating a new office, the Secretary says:

> I do not want a permanent official, because the chances are that if you appointed one there you would not be able to pay him a salary which would secure a first-class lawyer, and he would have practically little or nothing to do for nineteen-twentieths of the time. But now and then in half a dozen different cases, perhaps, since I have been in the office, it would have been a decided convenience to me if I could have telephoned to one or two or three, or perhaps half a dozen I know here, and asked them to come up there, saying that I would like to get their opinion on this question.

There are many contracts in connection with the work of the Navy Department, drawn up in that Department, involving large sums of money, upon which the Secretary of the Navy frequently desires legal advice.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit a question?

Mr. FOSS. Oh, certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it not a fact that in addition to the Judge-Advocate-General the Navy Department has in its employ lawyers for the purpose of passing on all contracts?

Mr. FOSS. Not outside of the Judge-Advocate-General's corps.

Mr. TAWNEY. They have lawyers that pass upon the legality and form of all contracts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are called law clerks.

Mr. TAWNEY. They have their law clerks for that purpose.

Mr. FOSS. But the head of the Judge-Advocate's Department is a naval officer. Mr. Hanna is a civil lawyer, an able one, who went into the Department a number of years ago and who is a part of the force. He receives a salary, I think, of about $2,500 a year.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to say that if the Secretary of the Navy needs an additional solicitor or an assistant attorney-general, and can satisfy the Committee on Naval Affairs that that office is necessary, I would not object; but I do not think we are justified in providing for a place under the guise of appropriating for legal advice to the extent of $5,000 a year. That being the case, Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order, on the ground that it is new legislation, not authorized by law.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I should like to ask the gentleman if this is the first appearance of a provision like this in the bill?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; this is the first appearance of a provision like this. It is in the contingent fund of the Navy, amounting to $65,000, which can be expended within the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say nothing upon the point of order. I think it is a question of doubt, though, as to whether it is subject to the point of order, whether it is not a limitation on the appropriation. It is under the contingent fund of the Navy, which is expended on the approval and authority of the Secretary of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. If it may be expended out of the contingent fund, of course the proviso is unnecessary. The Chair is of the opinion that it is new legislation, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Recruiting: Expenses of recruiting for the naval service; rent of rendezvous and expenses of maintaining the same; advertising for and obtaining men and apprentice seamen; actual and necessary expenses in lieu of mileage to officers on duty with traveling recruiting parties, $121,340.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> On page 5, in line 16, after the word "dollars," add: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended in recruiting seamen, ordinary seamen or apprenticed seamen, unless a certificate of birth, or other satisfactory evidence showing the applicant to be of the age required by naval regulations, shall be presented with the application for enlistment."

Mr. FOSS. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered in the hope of remedying an evil in the naval service that is a source of sorrow to a vast number of families of the country and the cause of no end of troubles to Members, particularly those who represent seaport districts. It aims to correct the abuse of enlistment by minors, who, unable to obtain the consent of their parents, resort to perjury to obtain admission into the naval service.

I do not attach blame to the recruiting officers, though I'm constrained to declare that they do not always exercise due discretion. It is a fact which can not be disputed that the number of these vexatious cases is far too large, and have been increasing at a rate which demands the immediate attention of Congress. In a moment of pique, following a quarrel at home, or discouraged over the failure to obtain employment, these lads, mere striplings, turn toward the recruiting offices.

Being under age and with parents who would never agree to their entering the service, these unthinking, foolish youths declare themselves 21, make oath to the misstatement, and are accepted. What happens? When they come to their better senses, when the heat of anger has cooled and the depression of disappointment worn off, and they realize their predicament, they write in piteous terms for release to their parents. The broken-hearted mother appeals to the Congressman of her district, confident that he has but to say the word and her erring offspring will be restored to liberty and his parents.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, the Congressman is powerless in the matter, but has to submit to the appeals and prayers of the distracted parents. I have in mind a case where I plainly told the mother of a young scamp, who had fraudulently enlisted, that nothing could be done. I advised her to leave him in the Navy, pointing out that if the authorities discovered that her boy had committed perjury they would order a court-martial, which would result in his being sentenced to a naval prison for a long term. She persisted, claiming that her boy would get but one year in a prison, where she could visit him frequently, while his service in the Navy would call for three years.

No thought of the disgrace that his sentence would bring to her son, no consideration of the lasting stigma upon his character this imprisonment would brand—only the desire to get him out. Mr. Chairman, I aim by this amendment to put barriers in the way of these juvenile evildoers. The Navy Department does not want them. The law governing enlistments fixes the minimum age of enlistment at 15, but is elastic so far as the authority of the Secretary of the Navy is concerned.

The Secretary has the power to fix the age so long as 15 years is the minimum and 35 the maximum. In a general order promulgated on November 29, 1904, the minimum was increased from 15 to 17 years, showing conclusively that the naval authorities did not want these young lads. They are scarcely enlisted before they begin to pine for home and mother. They are no good to the service. There is growing up in the country a powerful sentiment of hostility to the Army and Navy, and this sentiment is drawing heavily from the resentment of mothers and fathers of the land whose minor children have fallen into the meshes of the recruiting officer. Attention should be given and legislation enacted, Mr. Chairman, which will minimize, if not arrest, this abuse. It would seem as if no great amount of thought or ingenuity would be required to draft an amendment that will accomplish a reform along this line. I believe in the efficacy of my amendment. It will be argued that the element of impracticability too strongly enters; that it is not possible in all cases for an applicant to produce a certificate of birth, having possibly been born in a western city and wishing to enlist in an eastern station.

Mr. Chairman, if this be so, let him produce letters from those for whom he was employed, or a statement from neighbors. He must, indeed, be a queer member of society who can not furnish a line of evidence of some character to show that he has reached his majority. Not in a spirit of jocosity, I would say, by way of illustration, that an applicant for enlistment whose face bore a set of full-grown whiskers, which clearly indicated the owner to be a full-grown man, would be sufficient evidence. It is to halt the enlistment of the mere youth that this restriction seeks. The amendment is so drawn, Mr. Chairman, as to allow plenty of latitude for the recruiting officer. It will permit of broad construction, and all an officer need do is to exercise ordinary common sense and some degree of discretion and desirable results will follow. It will not involve additional expense upon the Government or work any hardship to the recruiting officer, but will save many a careless boy from starting his life wrong and prevent many a mother suffering heartache as the result of a son's waywardness. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I was not inattentive when the gentleman's amendment was offered, but I ask unanimous consent that it may be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I want to say that as I understood from hearing his amendment read, it would, under the ordinary rule of statutory construction, require in every case written evidence of some character. The amendment provides that he must bring a certificate of birth "or other evidence." The ordinary rule is that "other" means evidence of the same character.

Mr. KELIHER. If the gentleman will read the amendment carefully, he will see that it says "other satisfactory evidence." That allows all kinds of evidence.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me an interruption?

Mr. KELIHER. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. The recruit must now furnish evidence of his age, must he not, and that evidence must be under oath?

Mr. PALMER. And must be satisfactory.

Mr. TAWNEY. And it must be satisfactory to the recruiting officer.

Mr. KELIHER. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Therefore the gentleman's amendment would not accomplish the purpose he intends, provided the boy did not bring a certificate of birth; then he would bring the same evidence he is now required to bring.

Mr. KELIHER. I think where the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] errs is that when they enlist they bring no evidence whatsoever. They simply say they are over 21 years of age.

Mr. TAWNEY. They are made to take the oath.

Mr. KELIHER. Oh, they make them swear to it. I admit there is perjury, and I want to put barriers in the way of these youthful transgressors.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think what the gentleman intends to do is commendable. The only fear I have is that he will leave the door so wide open in the language that follows the words "certificate of birth" that the young men can get in under his proposed amendment just the same as they are doing now.

Mr. KELIHER. I desire to state to the gentleman that under the existing law these boys take oath. We do not change what already exists. The law is just as tight and just as loose under this amendment as it is to-day, but in addition to that a recruiting officer who recruits a boy 15 years of age when his attention is called to it is asked upon what evidence he recruited the boy, and he must produce a certificate of the boy's birth or some evidence that is of a satisfactory character. Now, will the gentleman contend that a simple statement signed by the boy——

Mr. TAWNEY. And sworn to.

Mr. KELIHER. The boy perjures himself. We admit that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Would not that be satisfactory?

Mr. KELIHER. No.

Mr. TAWNEY. I agree with the gentleman. I have had two cases of this kind in my own home city where I thought the recruiting officer was probably imposed upon by two boys who had fallen out with their parents and who submitted evidence, under oath, as to their age and were admitted into the Navy without knowledge on the part of their mothers, and it caused a great deal of distress on the part of their mothers, and a great deal of trouble on the part of their Representatives; but I fail to see how the gentleman is going to remedy the evil in the use of the language that he employs following the words "certificate of birth."

Mr. KELIHER. I would ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, the amendment would be strengthened if I were to insert the words "other than his own statement?"

Mr. TAWNEY. I think that would add very materially to the amendment.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to accept any amendment such as has been suggested by the gentleman unless it is thoroughly and carefully prepared. I would withdraw the point of order if this matter could be carefully considered and revised.

Mr KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to confer with the gentleman.

Mr. FOSS. I would suggest that we pass over this for the time being, and in the meantime, I think, we could prepare such an amendment as would meet with the approval of a great many gentlemen who have had more or less bother with this provision of the law.

Mr. KELIHER. I am perfectly willing to have it passed without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the paragraph may be passed without prejudice.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, before that request is put I desire to say a word or two as to the amendment. The present law provides that a boy under 18 years of age shall not be enlisted without the consent of his parent or guardian. That is the present law, and I will read the first section of it:

> Minors between the age of 16 and 18 shall not be enlisted for the naval service without the consent of their parents or guardians.

Mr. FOSS. Well, it is 17 now.

Mr. RIXEY. Well, whatever the law is. It is really 14, but the Navy Department does not enlist them under 17. There is also a provision—I saw it a few days ago—which provides that where a naval officer enlists boys under 18 years of age it shall be cause for his dismissal from the service, and it seems to me that the law as it exists at present, applying to persons under 18 years of age, is as explicit as it can be, except I would require that the consent of the parent or guardian should be in writing.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia whether he ever knew of a case or could cite a case where a recruiting officer was dismissed from the service.

Mr. RIXEY. Suppose I do not know of any such case; I am not responsible for the failure of the Department to enforce the statute in that respect.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, the Department can not enforce the provision, because the trouble, of course, is with the boy. He makes the statement that he is over 18 years of age. That being so, there is no necessity for getting the consent of the parents or the guardian, because the boy says he is over 18 years of age. It appears afterwards that he was under 18 years of age, and the recruiting officer says, "Here comes in some big tall fellow who says that he is over 18 years of age, and I am to be dismissed because I take the statement of a great tall fellow like that." It has been said there is no way to have him retired, because the authorities uniformly say if such an application is made they will punish the boy for perjury, and the provision of the gentleman from Massachusetts, it seems to me, is an eminently fair and just one that can do no harm and will cure quite a considerable evil.

Mr. PALMER. Cure nothing.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what I referred to a moment ago, there is a special penalty on the officer.

Any officer who knowingly enlists into the naval service any deserter from the naval or military service of the United States, or any insane or intoxicated person, or any minor between the ages of 16 and 18 years without the consent of his parents or guardian, or any minor under the age of 16 years, shall be dishonorably dismissed from the service of the United States.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I call attention to the clause which says, "Any officer who knowingly."

Mr. RIXEY. The gentleman surely would not want to change the statute in this respect. The officer should not be dismissed in disgrace unless he knew the boy to be under the proper age.

Mr. PERKINS. That is why the statute does not cure the evil. The statute is all right.

Mr. RIXEY. The statute is all right. Then if the boy is 17 years of age and swears he is over 18 your only remedy is to prosecute the boy.

Mr. PERKINS. That is a very harsh remedy.

Mr. RIXEY. That may be, but it is the only remedy.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that if the Navy Department would recede from the rule of giving the boy's parents the alternative of having the boy remaining under his enlistment or to be prosecuted for perjury the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts and all discussion upon this would be wholly unnecessary, for the Department would, upon proper showing made by the parent or guardian or their representatives that the boy was enlisted under age, give him an honorable discharge from the service.

Mr. RIXEY. I think the trouble about this whole matter is——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But they will not do that.

Mr. PALMER. A boy of 16 or 17 years of age is as guilty of committing perjury as well as a boy of 27, and giving him an honorable discharge is simply to permit perjury.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In all probability the youth is out with his brothers, out with his parents, and maybe ran away from home.

Mr. RIXEY. I would say to the gentleman if the boy has had the matter properly explained to him, and he deliberately swears falsely to his age he ought to be responsible. He ought to have the matter fairly explained to him, and if he does not, then the officer himself is liable. This depends, as in every other case, upon the facts. Now, I think the trouble is that boys are taken into the Navy between 18 and 21 years old without the consent of their parents. I do not believe that the Navy Department has the right to enlist boys between 18 and 21 years without the consent of the parents without express statute to that effect, and there does not seem to be an express statute. On Saturday I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL] the question whether or not between the ages of 18 and 21 a boy was required to present with his application for enlistment the written consent of his parents, and the gentleman from Massachusetts was under the same impression that I was, and stated that he did have to present that written request. Upon information from the Department I find that the Department does not require the written consent of the parents where the minor is between the years of 18 and 21.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIXEY. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have a case now in mind which occurred within two weeks where a young man attempted to enlist. He was over 18, but under 21. The parents were dead, and he was living with a married sister. He went to a gentleman who seems to make a business of it and had him appointed as his guardian in a court of competent jurisdiction, and was enlisted in the Navy with the consent of his legally appointed guardian. This young man was a youth who had been a sickly child and a cause of great worry to his relatives. His brother died of consumption, and this boy had the same characteristics that he did. Yet a physical examination discloses the fact that apparently he is in good health, and he will not be discharged from the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for two more minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield a moment for a question?

Mr. RIXEY. I will.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia this question: If he has stated it correctly, the law of the United States is that over the age of 18 a young man has a right to enlist, regardless of his parents' or guardian's consent?

Mr. RIXEY. I did not state that that was the law. I said that was the practice.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not the statute?

Mr. RIXEY. No. I would like to see the statute. I do not think there is any statute on the subject.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman what he thinks of this proposition. I call his attention to it because I had a discussion with Mr. Moody when he was Secretary of the Navy, and he took the position—at least was inclined to take the position—that even those who were over 18 and under 21 years, in those States that required the child to be subservient to the directions of the parent, would require the consent of the parents. And I can recall a case, but not the name or the court, where the court had discharged upon habeas corpus one or two young men who had been enlisted when over 18 and under 21, because under the laws of the State the parents were entitled to the service of the child until he became 21 years old. Now, while I am on my feet, I will say that I have investigated this matter, but not very carefully, in a case which I had, and I found that the Navy Department had, in my judgment—and in this I was sustained by the then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Moody—given a wrong construction to an opinion rendered by former Attorney-General Harmon in a certain case referred to him by the Navy Department. And the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Moody, concluded such construction was not authorized by the opinion, and that until a boy arrived at the age of 21 he was subject to the control of his parents, though it had been the practice of the Navy Department to take such enlistments of boys over 18 years of age without the consent of the parents.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] in what he states about his own opinion and that of Attorney-General Moody. In the absence of express statute from Congress I think unquestionably the Navy Department has no right to say it will enlist boys between 18 and 21 years in a State where the parent is entitled to the services of the boy and to the custody of the boy until he is 21 years of age. But the Navy Department, I am informed by the Department, proceeds upon the other theory, that it has a right to enlist boys between 18 and 21 without the consent of parent or guardian, and it is now doing that.

I know of one instance of a very poor man in a county in my district whose boy went away from home and enlisted. The old man needed his services at home in the cultivation of his farm and for the support of the family and appealed to me. I went to the Department, and the Department said that the boy was over 18. We admitted that, and the Department would not surrender the boy unless it was compelled to do so by law. The father of this boy was a very poor man, as I have said. He was not in a condition to go to law, and he had to give up the services of his son in this way. I shall insist, if any amendment goes on this bill, that an amendment ought to go on that will protect the right of the parent until the child becomes 21 years of age. No minor should be enlisted, under 21 years of age, without the consent of the parent or guardian.

Mr. DAWSON. Does not the gentleman think the difficulty might be cured if they required the written consent of the parents?

Mr. RIXEY. I agree with you. I said that it ought to be with the written consent of the parents or guardian in any case where the boy is under 21 years of age.

Mr. WANGER. I would ask my friend from Virginia whether or not cases have come to his notice where young men have forged the consent of their parents?

Mr. RIXEY. That may be. There are other cases that have come to my knowledge where people, not minors, have forged papers, and they are responsible.

Mr. WANGER. If the consent of the parent is to be required, ought it not to be required in such form that there will be no temptation to forge it?

Mr. RIXEY. I agree with the gentleman as to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the paragraph under consideration, with the point of order pending thereto, be passed without prejudice? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection; and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GREENE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bills of the following titles:

S. 5683. An act to provide for the removal of derelicts and other floating dangers to navigation;

S. 4976. An act to grant certain land to the State of Minnesota to be used as a site for the construction of a sanitarium for the treatment of consumptives; and

S. 2296. An act restoring to the public domain certain lands in the State of Minnesota.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 25.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3454) entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to William Wilson."

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 14397) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. FORAKER, and Mr. BLACKBURN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent: Advertising, telegraphing on public business, postage on letters sent abroad, ferriage, ice, continuous-service certificates, discharges, good-conduct badges, and medals for men and boys; transportation of effects of deceased officers and enlisted men of the Navy; books for training apprentice seamen and landsmen; maintenance of gunnery and other training classes; packing boxes and materials, and other contingent expenses and emergencies arising under cognizance of the Bureau of Navigation, unforeseen and impossible to classify, $15,000.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word. The enlistment of boys under age is not the only difficulty about enlistment in the Navy, according to the experience which I have had. I suppose the truth is that the Navy, through the fraudulent and false advertisements and pictures which it puts out, enlists a great many young men who become patriotic and enlist under a kind of supposition that they will have a fine time in the Navy, and when once in the Government is as inexorable and cold-blooded as anything ever could be in the world, at the North Pole or elsewhere. I have one case here, which is only an instance of a great many that constantly occur, to which I am going to call the attention of the House. A young fellow named Harry Ex, aged 20, in a moment of desperation and discouragement, enlisted in the Navy January 9 of this year. He is the oldest boy of a family of seven children, his father being an invalid and unable to earn any money. A younger brother is the only other wage-earner of the family, and his wages are about $3 a week as errand boy. The father and younger brother were sick and the mother about to be confined of the seventh child. The boy was very depressed, and evidently wishing to be rid of the worry and discouragement, being out of employment, enlisted in the Navy. We have a great deal of talk at times about the desirability of large families in the country and the need of young children growing up. But when this boy is needed at home much more than he is by his country in the Navy; when he ought to be helping to take care of the family of which he is a part, taking care of his invalid father, of his six brothers and sisters, oh, no, the Navy can not part with him, because an order of the President stands in the way.

I forwarded this letter to the Secretary of the Navy:

CHICAGO, January 30, 1906.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
Representative Second District of Illinois,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have a very pitiful case in which I would like you to interest yourself, if you can. A young fellow named Harry Ex, aged 20 years, in a moment of desperation and discouragement, enlisted in the Navy on January 9 of this year. He is the eldest boy of a family of seven children, his father being an invalid and unable to earn any money. A younger brother is the only other wage-earner in the family, and his wages are about $3 a week as an errand boy.

Harry, the boy who enlisted, was out of employment, and because of the strike of the union printers here had been unable for some time to work regularly. The father and a younger brother were sick and his mother was about to be confined of her seventh child; the boy was very much depressed, evidently anxious to be rid of his worries, and so enlisted, and now regrets it very sincerely. The family, as you may imagine, is in very poor circumstances; the mother is broken-hearted, and unless she gets her boy back the neighbors fear the consequences. The boy himself, never very strong, now realizes that he made a serious mistake and grievously wronged his family by deserting them in their hour of need, and is very anxious to get back home—so much so that he does not sleep, and is said to be losing in flesh. He is now at the Norfolk Navy-Yard.

I presume it will be a matter of some difficulty to secure this boy's discharge from the Navy, but it certainly would be an act of the greatest possible charity if he could be sent home to his family. If you will kindly set the machinery in motion and get the boy released you will win the parents' everlasting gratitude and my own sincere thanks.

Trusting to have your very early reply.

Yours, sincerely, GABRIEL J. NORDEN.

They are not constituents of mine. They live in the city of Chicago—the boy and his family—because it seems to me that anybody with a spark of patriotism in his soul would say that boy could do more good taking care of his mother and her children and his invalid father than he could helping on a battle ship floating in the water in time of peace. The Secretary of the Navy sent me the following response:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 21, 1906.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter in reference to the desired discharge of Harry Ex from the Navy. It would be a source of pleasure to me if I could comply with your request, but I am prevented from so doing by the Executive order on the subject of the discharge of enlisted men, a copy of which I inclose, and by which you will see that discharge can only be granted for unfitness or disability and upon the recommendation of the commanding officer. I regret the circumstances stated in this case, but there is really no action that I can take in the matter. I can only suggest that the young man should be able to make an allotment each month from his pay for the assistance of his family—

It is so large in the Navy, you know—and, if it is so desired, his attention will be called to the method by which this allotment may be made. I wish that I might give you a more favorable answer, but the order of the President is mandatory on the Department and leaves no opportunity for discretionary action on my part.

Very truly, yours,

CHARLES J. BONAPARTE, Secretary.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

The order of the President is as follows:

GENERAL ORDER } NAVY DEPARTMENT,
No. 104. } Washington, August 16, 1902.

The following Executive Order, superseding the Executive Order of July 10, 1902, which was promulgated in General Order No. 98, is published for the information and guidance of the service:

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 13, 1902.

No enlisted person serving in the Navy or Marine Corps of the United States shall be discharged therefrom prior to the completion of his term of enlistment except for one of the following causes: Undesirablity, inaptitude, physical or mental disability, or unfitness.

In every case the recommendation for such discharge must be made by the immediate commanding officer under whom the man may be serving.

Applications for discharges which reach the Department in any way except through said commanding officers shall be, without exception, disregarded.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

CHAS. H. DARLING, Acting Secretary.

Nothing that could happen at home could get the boy discharged; nothing could get him out of the Navy except his unfitness, or that he commit some act which ought to fire him out. The bowels of compassion were removed from that order. So that we have the President of the United States one minute telling the people to raise large families and the next minute issuing an order forbidding under any circumstances the discharge of a boy from the Navy. [Laughter and applause.] Now, the responsibility of this does not rest upon the President, but upon the Secretary of the Navy, for we all know how these orders are issued by the President. They are issued because the Secretary of the Navy, or the naval officers under him, demand that such order be issued. I say that that order is an outrage on common decency. It ought to be removed by the President; it ought to be removed by law, if necessary. To say that under no circumstances can a boy in the Navy be discharged for cause at home, if his father dies, if his mother has passed away, leaving a family of children that he ought to support—to say that his country needs him in time of peace more than he is needed at home under such circumstances is an insult to partiotism and intelligence.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. I move to strike out the last word that I may ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Has the gentleman from Illinois prepared an amendment to the bill that will reach such a case as he cites?

Mr. MANN. I have not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Do you propose to do it?

Mr. MANN. I do not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Then for what purpose have you stirred us up, until we want to help your boy and other boys, if you do not propose an amendment upon which we can vote?

Mr. MANN. I know very well that if I presented an amendment to that effect it would promptly be met by my distinguished colleague from Illinois with a point of order. I was endeavoring to reach the hearts of the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, and the Navy Department itself, hoping that there might be an amendment either of the law or of the order, to change the present harsh condition.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think the gentleman from Illinois has not only reached the hearts of his colleagues in the House, but similar letters which have come to his colleagues in the House have also reached their hearts.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have had several such cases, and I think the time has come when Congress ought in some way to provide that the only boy in a large family relying upon his services might, when the father is taken away and the family becomes dependent upon the son, in time of peace be let out from the Navy.

Mr. BATES. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not believe that more care should be exercised by the recruiting officers before the contract is entered into? The remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would lead to the violation of all contracts entered into by the young man under the circumstances.

Mr. MANN. A boy 20 years old could not enter into any other kind of a contract which would bind him, except the one with the Government.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, if the remarks directed to our hearts, as the gentleman says, by the gentleman from Illinois were followed out in the Army and Navy every time the papas and mammas of the country wanted to see their boys, we would have no Army and no Navy left.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I wish to say, in connection with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has so well said, that the overeagerness of the recruiting officers very often gets boys into the Navy under circumstances that are exceedingly reprehensible. I know of one instance where a young man who ought to have been at home, whose services were demanded there by those absolutely dependent upon him, and who had no business in the Navy, enlisted while he was intoxicated. Those matters where brought before the authorities, and they said: "It does not make any difference. He is here, and we need him." And all efforts to secure his release were absolutely unavailing. It is a common thing for young men to be dragged into this service by the overzeal of recruiting officers, and the Department ought, at least under circumstances of that kind, to take the manner of the enlistment under consideration.

I know of another instance where a young man was engaged to be married to a young lady. Shortly before the marriage was to take place, after a lovers' quarrel, in a fit of desperation the young man enlisted in the Navy. It was reported that he had attempted to escape from his obligation to marry his sweetheart. When the boy heard that his conduct had compromised the woman he loved, he was frantic to return and correct the cruel and erroneous report. The family were anxious for him to return, but it took half the people in one end of the State of Kentucky to get that boy home long enough to marry that girl. [Laughter.] These ironclad regulations, this grim visaged war that frowns on us all the time and everywhere, blind and deaf to every character of compassion, is growing intolerable. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has this paragraph been passed without prejudice?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; it has been passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that the paragraph has, by unanimous consent, been passed without prejudice.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval training station, Great Lakes: Maintenance of naval training station: Labor and material; general care; repairs and improvements to grounds, buildings, and pier; street-car fare; purchase and maintenance of live stock, and attendance on same; wagons, carts, implements, and tools, and repairs to same; fire extinguishers; heating, lighting, and furniture; stationery, books, and periodicals; ice, and washing; expressage; packing boxes and materials; postage, telegraphing, and telephoning, and all other contingent expenses, $20,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that paragraph that the appropriation is not authorized by law and that it changes existing law.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman has made a point of order against this paragraph.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I reserved the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has reserved the point of order against the section.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have reserved the point of order against the paragraph beginning on line 7 and ending on line 16, page 8.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Wisconsin bases his objection upon the ground that there is no law authorizing the appropriation proposed to be made. I call the attention of the Chair to the act of Congress which was passed during the last term. It was proposed that there should be established somewhere in the West at some convenient point a station where young men enlisting in the Navy might be trained, a place convenient to his home, a place where he might be taught. After a good deal of discussion Congress passed the act and authorized a commission to select a site for this station. The commission acted and selected the site for which the appropriation is to be made. I further call the attention of the Chair to the fact that appropriations have already been made for the maintenance of this station. If the Chair desires to examine the act of Congress of 1904, he will find that under the heading of "Naval training station for the Great Lakes" an appropriation of $250,000 was made, and the purpose was to purchase land. The President by that act of Congress was authorized and empowered to appoint a board, and the appropriation asked for in this bill has no other purpose than to maintain the station and to provide for such conveniences as the Navy may require. Therefore, I submit that the necessary legislation has already been passed, and these appropriations are in order.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have always understood that no portion of the $250,000 was expended. I understood that the board accepted a gift of a site, and I did not suppose there was any law which authorized the expenditure of the $250,000 except for the purchase of a site. I have always understood that the site was given and that no part of this money was expended.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word on this proposition. In the Navy appropriation bill approved April 27, 1904, appears this provision:

Naval training station, Great Lakes: The purchase of land and the establishment of a naval training station on the Great Lakes, $250,000.

I am reading from Pulsifer's Compilation of the Naval Laws, page 444. The Chairman will mark the words "the purchase of land and the establishment." Then it goes on:

The President is hereby authorized and empowered to appoint such a board, consisting of not less than three members, none of whom shall be a resident of any State bordering on the Great Lakes, whose duty it shall be to select the most available site for such naval training station on the Great Lakes, and having selected such site, to ascertain and report its probable cost and the probable expenditure which will be necessary for improving the same, including lake shore protection and construction of necessary harbor facilities, and to make a detailed report of their findings and proceedings to the President, who, upon approval of such report, shall authorize the purchase of such site and the establishment of such naval training station.

All of these provisions have been carried out in the establishment for this naval training station. The board has reported to the President, and the President has ordered the establishment of it, and did it more than a year ago. The station has been established at Lake Bluff. The citizens of Chicago contributed $172,000, bought the land, and turned it over to the United States Government. It is to-day, and has been for many months, expending out of this appropriation of $250,000, which Congress authorized two years ago, such moneys as are necessary to make the improvements which are being made on that site to-day.

So there is no question as to the propriety of our providing here for the maintenance of this training station. A little further on in the bill is a provision for the construction of buildings, but as to the establishment of it and as to the propriety of this legislation there is no question in my mind, and I am sure there is no question in the mind of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLMSTED). The Chair finds that by an act approved April 27, 1904, Congress authorized and appropriated $250,000 for the purchase of land and the establishment of a naval training station on the Great Lakes. It gave the necessary authority for the selection of a site and the establishment of such naval training station.

It appears from the statements that have been made that the site or a portion of land for the site was contributed by the citizens, but that does not seem to the Chair to impair the fact that the establishment of the station was authorized. The paragraph to which the point of order is urged appropriates for the maintenance of the naval training station thus authorized. It seems to the Chair that it is clearly in continuance of a Government work authorized and in progress, and therefore in order.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair permit one more suggestion? The law which the Chair has been reading provides that the board shall select the most available site for such naval training station on the Great Lakes, and, having selected such site, ascertain and report its probable cost and the probable expenditure which would be necessary for improving the same, including lake-shore protection and construction of necessary harbor facilities, and to make a detailed report of their findings and proceedings to the President, who, upon approval of such report, to wit, a detailed report, etc. It is my understanding that this was approved without any such report being submitted. There may have been some months after the first approval a report filed, but the selection was approved without there having been any such estimates, any such investigation reported—no details as to the probable expenditure submitted, because I asked the secretary of the President what communications, if any, had come from that board, and he submitted a letter or a copy of a letter written by the then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Paul Morton, saying that the site was all right, and ought to be approved, and it was approved. There may have been since that time estimates submitted, detailed plans drawn, and likewise submitted. As to that I do not know, and will ask the chairman of the committee in respect to that.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, the report of this Commission was submitted to the President. The Commission unanimously selected a certain site, and that report was submitted to the President, and the President approved the selection of the site and ordered the establishment of a naval training station. The report of the commission was brought out in the hearings of last year before the Committee on Naval Affairs, and is a part of the hearings of that committee, and estimates have been made by the Department for this station. It came up in the regular Book of Estimates this year.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLMSTED). The act specifically provides that the President, upon approval of such report, shall authorize the purchase of such a site and the establishment of such naval training station. The Chair understands from the chairman of the Naval Committee that the President approved the report, that the site had been secured, and the naval training station established. The paragraph in question appropriates for the maintenance of that naval training station, and the Chair is constrained, therefore, to hold that it is in order.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph, and on that I desire to be heard. Members, upon consulting the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, will observe that it recommends that an appropriation of $750,000 be made toward improvements contemplated upon the site of the naval training station at Lake Bluff, and declares that an eventual expenditure of $2,000,000 will be necessary for the completion of buildings and other improvements. This proposed large expenditure in and of itself alone makes this paragraph of importance.

I now ask the attention of Members of the House to another matter of great importance in connection with this proposed appropriation. On the 17th of October last the Chicago Tribune, one of the great newspapers of the country—I think that it is not indulging in superlatives to say one of the great newspapers of the world—contained, on the front page, an article concerning the Lake Bluff site, which I will read. Lake Bluff is located about 30 miles from the city of Chicago. The article is headed: "New war on naval school—Senator ALGER reopens fight on the Lake Bluff site—Claims water is polluted—State board of health aids at request of Lake Forest."

Before reading the article I wish to remind Members that Lake Forest is on the shore of Lake Michigan, about 6 miles south of the city of Waukegan, and that between these two cities is Lake Bluff. It must be borne in mind also that in the Government's published request for proposals for sites, one of the requirements was that the site should have a bathing beach.

The Tribune article is as follows:

ALGER STARTS THE CRUSADE.

Senator ALGER visited Lake Forest last summer, and learned from Doctor Haven, the health officer of Lake Forest, of the sanitary agitation that was being carried on in an effort to secure relief from the polluted waters incident to the tannery at Kenosha and the glucose factory at Waukegan, and in company with Doctor Haven made an automobile trip to Lake Bluff, and found from the engineering staff there that similar sanitary conditions existed. It was supposed at the time that Senator ALGER was merely a summer visitor at Lake Forest, but in view of recent developments it is thought that his real object was to learn the truth of the rumors regarding bad sanitary conditions at Lake Bluff, and to use his influence to secure a reopening of the question of the location of the site when the next Congress convenes.

APPEAL TO BOARD OF HEALTH.

It seems that the pollution of the waters of Lake Michigan has been a source of great annoyance to the residents of Lake Forest for many months. Recently a number of residents employed the legal firm of Scott, Bancroft, Lord & Stevens to take the matter up and secure what relief they could in the premises.

This firm had an analysis made of the water in question by Professor Long, of Northwestern University, also a chemist for the Illinois State board of health, which confirmed the contentions of the residents of Lake Forest regarding the discoloration of the water, its polluted condition, and the noxious odors.

The next action of the attorneys was to appeal to the State board of health. As a result of the appeal, Dr. E. F. Baker, of Jacksonville, special officer of the State board of health, went to Lake Forest last Saturday and spent two days there. He also visited Lake Bluff. His report was filed with Doctor Egan, head of the State board of health, and shows the contention to be practically as shown by the analysis of Professor Long.

Doctor Baker stated that the polluted conditions existed and that they undoubtedly were caused by the immense quantities of sewage and refuse matter dumped into Lake Michigan by the cities above Lake Forest within a distance of 25 of 30 miles.

The glucose factory at Waukegan dumps into the lake from their plant an average of over 9,000,000,000 gallons of refuse a day. A percentage of the refuse is gluten, and from this substance gases are given off, forming the noxious odors complained of by the residents of Lake Forest. The tannery located at Kenosha is one of the largest in the world, and large quantities of refuse from this source is a serious factor in the polluted conditions. * * *

Then follows a statement of Doctor Haven, health officer of Lake Forest, 2 miles farther south of Waukegan than is Lake Bluff, in which he says that there is nothing the matter with the water and that there is no objection to the location of the naval training school there. But this statement does not answer the plain facts set forth in the official report of the chemist of the State board of health of Illinois——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Nor does the statement of the Lake Forest physician at all meet the analysis made by Professor Long, of the Northwestern University. But even Doctor Haven himself says:

It is true that the water sometimes emits an unpleasant odor, caused by the organic deposits thrown into it from the glucose factory at Waukegan. At times when there is a northeast wind we can smell those glucose deposits, but they are not injurious to the health, and the people living along the shore get along notwithstanding the odor.

That may be, but is it possible that the young men at the proposed naval training school will enjoy bathing in water so polluted and foul smelling that the people of Lake Forest employed lawyers and called upon the State board of health to secure relief from the nuisance?

It will be said that two boards have decided in favor of Lake Bluff. Two years ago, in the debate here, I said that the first board never made what could be called an "inspection" of the site near my home at Racine and that the senior member of the first board never visited that site at all. This statement of mine was contradicted by a letter written by a member of that board, which was read to the House. Not expecting to hear any such extraordinary statement as was contained in that letter, I was then unprepared with written or documentary evidence to reply to it. I am now prepared to demonstrate the truth of what I then asserted as to the alleged visits of the first board. This may not be entirely germane at the present time, but nevertheless it shows how this thing has been done, and is therefore instructive. It is admitted by everybody that the first board came to Racine only on August 4 and October 31, 1902—two visits only.

I now reiterate my statement that they did not on their first visit go within a mile and a half of the Racine site, and I have here now the documentary proof to establish my contention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may have fifteen minutes in which to conclude. It is a matter of importance, I think, to the committee that they should know the facts in connection with the selection of the site at Lake Bluff.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] asks that he may have fifteen minutes in which to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman allow me to conclude my statement? Then I think there will be opportunity for questions.

Mr. RIXEY. Does not the gentleman consider that this question of the site is closed? That is the whole question, as I understand it. Now, when this matter was up a year ago——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand. You have asked the question. I do not think that it ought to be deemed closed, in view of the fact that the State board of health has been examining the water there through their official chemist and find it polluted by the great amount of sewage dumped into the lake by the glucose factory at Waukegan and by the large tanneries at Kenosha, the odor being so vile that the people of Lake Forest made formal complaint.

Mr. Chairman, on August 17, 1902, I wrote this letter to Admiral Taylor. I read from page 198 of the copy book:

I am in receipt of your letter. As I wrote you in my last letter, I hope very much that your board will not fail again to visit Kenosha and Racine. Your previous visits were too brief to permit of anything like an examination. This is specially true of the site at Racine. You will recall that your board did not go nearer than a mile and a half to the proposed site in this city on North Point.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Has the gentleman received a reply to that letter?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They never replied to it.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Then how does the gentleman know that they did not go within a mile and a half?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They made only two visits to Racine, and both times I was with them constantly from their arrival until their departure. On the first visit we stopped a mile and a half from the site because it was so late in the day, the board promising to come again and make a thorough examination of the site.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. They never admitted that they had not been within a mile and a half of the site?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is it possible that so soon after that first visit I would write a letter like this, and embody in it a deliberate falsehood about their failure to go to the site at North Point?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. How does the gentleman know they had not been within a mile and a half of it?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Because the first board made only two visits to Racine—one on August 4 and one on October 31. Everybody admits that.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Do they say in those statements that they did not visit these points that the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why, one of the board says that they made a visit to a site in Racine in August. As a matter of fact, we went simply to the foot of High street and stopped a mile and a half from North Point site.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. The question occurred to me, that might possibly occur to other members of the committee, that the gentleman might be mistaken.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is not possible for me to be mistaken at all, as the gentleman can see and as I shall demonstrate.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. It is possible for the gentleman to be mistaken.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I was with them all of the time on both visits. I met them there and went with them. They notified me that they were coming. The proof of the truth of my statement is here. Besides my letters I have affidavits of business men of Racine.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. There was afterwards another commission, was there not?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman is referring to the second board, he is talking about another and entirely different subject

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. There was another commission that visited there?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; and I will speak of them a little later. I wish now to present the evidence concerning the visits of the first board.

In support of my statement I shall offer two kinds of evidence, namely: First, my letter written to the board immediately after their respective visits to Racine; second, affidavits of members of the citizens' committee who accompanied the board during these visits.

I have here my letter-press book containing copies of all letters dictated by me from July 5, 1902, to November 26, 1902. On page 198 of this book I find a letter dated August 17—two weeks after the first visit of the board. This letter shows conclusively that the board did not visit any site in or near the city of Racine on August 4, 1902.

RACINE, WIS., August 17, 1902.

Admiral H. C. TAYLOR, United States Navy,
Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your Cleveland letter of the 14th instant.

As I wrote you in my last letter, I hope very much that your board will not fail again to visit Kenosha and Racine. Your previous visits were too brief to permit of anything like a thorough examination of the sites. This is especially true of the site at Racine.

You will recall that your board did not go nearer than a mile and a half to the proposed site in this city, on North Point.

The House will observe that in this letter I spoke of "the site at Racine," and of "the proposed site in this city, on North Point," thus showing clearly that there was then only one site—the site at North Point—which that city had to offer. And not only did I speak of this site, but I took occasion in this letter to remind the board that during their visit of August 4 they had not been nearer than a mile and a half of it.

The whole letter is as follows:

RACINE, WIS., August 17, 1902.

Admiral H. C. TAYLOR, U. S. N.,
Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your Cleveland letter of the 14th instant.

As I wrote you in my last letter, I hope very much that your board will not fail again to visit Kenosha and Racine. Your previous visits were too brief to permit of anything like a thorough examination of the sites. This is especially true of the site at Racine. You will recall that your board did not go nearer than a mile and a half to the proposed site in this city on North Point. This site is a peninsula from one-half to three-quarters of a mile in width, projecting into the lake about 1 mile, and forming a bay perfectly protected from northeast storms—the only severe storms of this locality. The ground is all level and from 30 to 50 feet above the lake, excepting a ravine and a slough, which can be easily converted into a commodious harbor. The site is also a short distance from the main line of the Northwestern Railroad between Chicago and Milwaukee.

While your board made a more thorough examination of the Kenosha site, I am sure that the people of that city will be much pleased to have you make another and more complete inspection of it. As requested in your letter, I will be pleased to convey your message to the mayors and committees on sites of the respective cities.

Hoping that you will not fail again to visit Racine and Kenosha,

I am, very respectfully,

H. A. COOPER, M. C.,
First District of Wisconsin.

A little later, under date of September 5, 1902, I wrote the board another letter, a copy of which is found on page 241 of this letter-press book. This letter constitutes absolutely conclusive evidence that the board did not inspect any site at Racine on their visit of August 4, 1902. In this letter I distinctly reminded the board that there were only two sites in my Congressional district, one at Racine and the other at Kenosha, and that the board had "not as yet made any inspection of the site at Racine."

The letter is as follows:

RACINE, WIS., September 5, 1902.

Admiral H. C. TAYLOR, U. S. N.,
Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of August 27.

I note with pleasure the statement that your board expects to complete its preliminary examination of sites some time during the present month of September, and that it will be pleased to make a personal examination of any sites suggested by me. In this connection I desire to say that there are but two sites in my district—one at Racine and the other at Kenosha. Either of these would make an admirable location for the Great Lakes naval training station. Your board made a partial examination of the Kenosha site, but has not as yet made any inspection of the site at Racine. As you will recall, these two sites are but 10 miles apart. Permit me, therefore, to urge that your board visit both of them on your September visit.

I shall be greatly obliged if in reply to this you will kindly inform me as to when your board will visit this locality.

Awaiting your reply, I am, very respectfully,

H. A. COOPER, M. C.,
First District of Wisconsin.

Mr. Chairman, the board did not again visit Racine until October 31, 1902. Only four days later (November 4, 1902) I wrote the board another letter, a copy of which appears on page 425 of this letter-press book.

In this letter I reminded the president of the board that he had never personally made an examination of the North Point site, and distinctly informed him that the two other members of the board on their visit of October 31, 1902, arrived at so late an hour as to make it impossible for them to see the site by daylight.

The letter reads as follows:

RACINE, WIS., November 4, 1902.

Admiral H. C. TAYLOR, United States Navy,
Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Permit me to say an additional word concerning the site for the naval training station.

Your full board has already visited the fine site at Kenosha, and two of your members have made a second visit. I shall not, therefore, refer to it in detail at this time. Inasmuch, however, as you personally have never made an examination of the North Point site near this city, I desire now to call attention to its very great merits.

It is to be regretted that Lieutenant-Commander Winslow and Engineer Rousseau on their visit here last week arrived at so late an hour (4.30 p. m.) as to make it impossible for them to see the site by daylight. It was after 5 o'clock before we arrived on the ground, too late to make a satisfactory inspection.

The North Point site can not be excelled anywhere. The ground is from 30 to 35 feet above the lake, very fertile, generally level, and in every way peculiarly adapted to the requirements of the proposed naval training station. There is ample opportunity to make a harbor, which could be easily kept in good condition. The fine harbor of the city of Racine, with a channel depth of 21 feet, is also available. Without great expense the site could easily be made an island by dredging the ravine which extends across the point. There is a beautiful beach more than a mile in length. The point itself furnishes absolutely perfect protection from northeast storms, the only troublesome storms in this section. From the north side of the site Milwaukee is visible, 20 miles away, and from the south side there is a fine view of the bay and harbor of the city of Racine.

This shore of Lake Michigan has the lowest death rate of any portion of the United States, and it would be impossible to find a more healthful locality than North Point.

Located between Chicago and Milwaukee, the site is near the center of a great population, to which it is easily accessible.

In locality, eligibility, healthfulness, and every other essential the site at North Point is ideal.

I have the honor to remain, very respectfully,

H. A. COOPER, M. C.,
First District of Wisconsin.

Mr. Chairman, these letters were written when the incidents were fresh in my mind, and at a time when there was no thought of the controversy which has arisen.

But, Mr. Chairman, in addition to these letters I have affidavits which I desire to present. I secured these affidavits in this way: Two years ago, immediately after the gentleman from Illinois read the letter from the member of the board, I mailed a copy of it to Mr. R. M. Boyd, one of the committee of citizens who accompanied the board during its visits to Racine, together with a letter from myself requesting him to forward me affidavits of the members of the committee setting forth the facts as to these visits. I will insert in the RECORD a copy of my letter to Mr. Boyd, although it would have been in somewhat different form if originally intended for publication. In it there is no suggestion of what I had said during the debate, but only a request for affidavits showing the exact facts.

My letter to Mr. Boyd is as follows:

FEBRUARY 24, 1904.

Mr. R. M. BOYD, Racine, Wis.

MY DEAR MR. BOYD: Before this reaches you you will know of the two days' fight in the House and of the defeat of the naval-training-school proposition.

I never was more astonished in a debate than when to-day Mr. Foss read a letter written by Commander Winslow, saying that on the first visit of the board (August 4, 1902) they were met at the station in Racine and proceeded in carriages to examine a site a short distance north of the city; that the board inspected this site and afterwards returned to the city and to the railway station. They say that the site at North Point was not presented to the board except in a casual way, and therefore they only visited the site which the committee had to offer.

Did you ever hear of anything to surpass that? I can not imagine how Winslow came to make such a statement. I herewith inclose a copy of the Winslow letter above referred to.

I wish that you would get an affidavit from each man who was with the escort party on that day, setting forth the exact facts as to where the board were driven and how near they came to reaching either of the proposed sites. Have each affiant give his business and state his official position, either the one he at present occupies or the one he occupied on the day of the visit. Have these affidavits made before a notary public, who shall affix his seal to each one of them, or before a judge or some other court officer having a seal. Have each affidavit cover the necessary points, and send to me by earliest possible mail.

Please show this letter to Mr. Walker and other interested friends. I prefer that it shall not be made public until after I have presented the affidavits.

Very truly, yours, H. A. COOPER.

A few days after mailing this letter I received an affidavit of each member of the citizens' committee. One of the affiants is Hon. Michael Higgins, a leading manufacturer of my city, who was at that time its mayor. Other affiants are W. A. Walker and R. M. Boyd, for the last thirty years citizens of Racine and prominently identified with its business interests. Another affiant is Mr. Henry J. Schroff, now and for several years past city clerk in the city of Racine.

Mayor Higgins accompanied the board on only its first visit, August 4, 1902. In his affidavit he swears that the board, accompanied by the citizens' committee, were driven to the lake shore at High street; that no naval training station site was offered to the board in that vicinity; but that while standing there on the bank North Point was pointed out and the statement made that on the south side of it there was a large slough or creek where a splendid harbor could be secured with comparatively little cost.

He swears that the board declined to drive up there, a distance of about 2 miles from where they then stood, assigning as a reason that they had not sufficient time. He adds that they remained at that place a few minutes and were then driven back to the railway station. He also swears that at the first visit of the board to Racine there was positively no site inspected or visited by the board, as the point where they stopped is in a densly populated portion of the city, and that no site was mentioned to them except the North Point site.

The affidavit of Mayor Higgins is as follows:

HIGGINS SPRING AND AXLE COMPANY,
MANUFACTURERS OF WAGON AND CARRIAGE SPRINGS AND AXLES,
Racine, Wis., February 25, 1904.

M. Higgins, jr., being first duly sworn, deposes and says that in the year 1902 he was mayor of the city of Racine, and that on or about the 4th day of August, 1902, he was informed by Mr. Lloyd, agent for the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company in this city, that the board for the selection of a site for a naval training station on the Great Lakes was on their line of road and would reach the city of Racine along in the afternoon and would stop off here for a short time if desired to do so. The board arrived at the Chicago and Northwestern depot during the afternoon, was met there by carriages and driven over to Hotel Racine, where they were introduced to myself and to a number of other persons.

That after a few moments conversation a member of the board made the statement that they were limited for time and had but a very short time, possibly thirty minutes, to remain in the city, and that while here they desired to obtain as much information as possible in reference to our harbor and harbor facilities.

That the board, together with several citizens, including Congressman H. A. COOPER, entered the carriages and were driven up North Main street to High street and from there east to the lake bank, from which point a splendid view of Racine Bay and Harbor can be obtained. There was no naval training station offered to them at that point, but while standing there North Point was pointed out to them and the statement made that at the south side of the point there was a large slough or creek entering the lake, known locally as "Duck Creek," where a splendid harbor could be obtained with comparatively small cost. The board declined to drive up there, a distance of about 2 miles from where we stood, assigning as the reason that they had not sufficient time. We remained at that point possibly from ten to fifteen minutes. The board was then driven back to the Chicago and Northwestern depot by the way of High street and Milwaukee road. That at the first visit of the board to this city there was positively no site inspected nor visited by the board, as the point where we stopped is in a densely populated portion of the city and no site was mentioned to them except the North Point site.

Upon the visit of the board at a later period, I believe some time in October, I was absent from the city.

[SEAL.] R. M. BOYD, Notary Public.

Notarial commission expires August 15, 1904.

In Mr. Walker's affidavit he swears that on the first visit of the board they were met at the station and driven to Hotel Racine; proceeded from the hotel to the east end of High street, where the entire company left the carriages and walked to the edge of the bluff to view Racine Harbor and the bay lying between the harbor and North Point. He adds that a distinct statement was made by Admiral Taylor that he could not allow Racine but one-half an hour. He says that the board alighted from their carriages at the end of High street, where there was no possible location for a naval training station; that that vicinity was never suggested as a site, and that the visit of the board to the place where they alighted from the carriages was only for the purpose of getting a view of the harbor and the general surroundings, it being understood that one-half an hour was all the time they could give Racine and that it would be impossible for them to visit North Point at that time.

He adds, however, that a promise was then made that the board would visit the proposed site at their earliest possible convenience. Mr. Walker swears that on their second visit—October 31—the board was met at the railway station at about 4.30 p. m. and driven to North Point. He says that before starting the gentlemen of the receiving party took out their watches, expressed the opinion that it would be impossible to reach the site before dusk, and asked if the board could not await a more favorable opportunity to visit it, to which they replied that it would not be possible for them to come again. Mr. Walker says that under these unfavorable conditions the party drove as rapidly as possible to North Point, arriving after the lights had been lit in the farmhouses.

The affidavit of Mr. Walker is as follows:

RACINE, WIS., February 26, 1904.

To whom it may concern:

I, W. A. Walker, a citizen of Racine for the past thirty years, at present and for twenty years past have been a manufacturer, hereby certify that as a member of the Racine Business Men's Association, I, with the mayor, city clerk, and others, met Rear-Admiral Taylor, Commander C. McR. Winslow, and Civil Engineer H. H. Rousseau, as representatives of the United States Navy, constituting an examining board for the purpose of selecting a site for the proposed naval station on the Great Lakes, on or about August 4, 1902. The said naval committee were met at the Chicago Northwestern Railway station with carriages and driven to the Hotel Racine and proceeded from the hotel to the north side of Racine, at the east end of High street, where the entire party got out of the carriages, walked to the edge of the bluff, and viewed the Racine Harbor and the beautiful bay lying between the harbor and Wind Point; that the distinct statement was made by Admiral Taylor that he could not allow us but one-half hour at that time, and in view of that fact a member of our committee pointed out our proposed site at Wind Point, stating that there was a small stream entering the lake on the south side of said site, which was splendidly protected from all of the heavy storms, and that this location at Wind Point was the only site for the proposed naval station that we had to offer at Racine, so far as I know. Where the committee alighted from the carriages, at the end of High street, there was no suitable location for a naval station; it was never suggested as such, and the visit of the committee to the place where we did alight from the carriages was solely for the purpose of getting a view of the harbor and the general surroundings, it being distinctly understood that one-half hour was all the time they could give us on that first visit and it would be impossible for the committee to visit Wind Point at that time, a promise, however, being made that they would visit our proposed site at their earliest possible convenience.

I also state that on the second visit of two members of the committee, Commander C. McR. Winslow and Chief Engineer H. H. Rousseau, about October 31, 1902, they were met at the Northwestern Railway station at about 4.30 p. m. by a committee and driven direct from the station to Wind Point. At that time Hon H. A. COOPER, M. C.; W. H. Kranz, president of our Business Men's Association; myself, and other persons present, took out our watches and expressed the opinion that as the proposed site was 3 miles from the station, it would be impossible to arrive on the grounds before dusk, and asked if the committee could give us a more favorable opportunity to show them the proposed site, to which they replied that they did not think that it was possible for them to call again; that therefore, under these unfavorable conditions, we drove as fast as possible to the proposed site, and arrived after the lights had been lit in the farmhouses.

After this very meager examination by the board of our proposed site, the Business Men's Association felt that sufficient information was not in the hands of the committee, and therefore, at a very great expense, engineers were sent to Wind Point, and also photographers, and by photographs, maps, and drawings our Business Men's Association has endeavored to place before the naval board information that we believed necessary to prove that Wind Point and the beautiful bay lying between the Racine Harbor and Wind Point was the best possible site for the proposed naval training station on the west shore of Lake Michigan. The above statements are true and correct.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. Boyd in his affidavit swears that Admiral Taylor informed the receiving party that the board had only about thirty minutes to spend at Racine on August 4; that they were driven to the lake shore at the east end of High street, and that while standing there he (Mr. Boyd) called the attention of Admiral Taylor to North Point; that the board declined to drive to the point, which was about 1½ miles distant, assigning as a reason that they had not sufficient time, but adding that they would return later in the season and devote as much time as necessary to make a complete investigation of the site. Mr. Boyd swears that on their first visit to Racine the board inspected no site, and that there was no site offered except only the North Point site. He adds that there was positively no site offered or inspected at the point on the lake shore where the board stopped, as it is in a thickly settled portion of the city.

Mr. Boyd swears that when he mentioned the North Point site to Admiral Taylor the latter called the attention of Engineer Rousseau, the recorder of the board, to the statement which he (Mr. Boyd) had made, and requested Rousseau to make a memorandum of the same, promising to devote ample time for an inspection of the site when the board returned later in the season. Mr. Boyd swears that on their second visit (October 31) the board did not reach the station until 4.30 o'clock in the afternoon, when they were informed that because of the lateness of their arrival it would be impossible to reach North Point and thoroughly inspect the site on that day; that the board were invited to remain at the hotel overnight and make an inspection in the morning; that they declined to do this for the reason that they were traveling on schedule time and were to inspect a site at Sheboygan early the next morning; that thereupon, as fast as possible, the drive was made to North Point, but that when the board arrived there the lamps were lighted in the farmhouses.

Mr. Boyd swears that it was upon this occasion that he called the attention of the board to another possible site lying east of the highway on which the party traveled going to North Point, and beginning about three-quarters of a mile north of the city limits; that the members of the board did not stop or alight from their carriages and inspect the site, but merely looked at it as they drove along the road. It is known in their report as "North Point Site B." Mr. Boyd swears that this was the only time (October 31, 1902) that the attention of the board was called to this site, except through correspondence. As I have before said, Mr. Chairman, it is also a fact that this "Site B" was never seriously considered.

The affidavit of Mr. Boyd is as follows:

STATE OF WISCONSIN, Racine County, ss:

I, R. M. Boyd, the undersigned, being first duly sworn, on oath state that for more than thirty years past I have been a resident of the city of Racine and State of Wisconsin and that for the past ten years I have been engaged in the real estate and insurance business in this city. On or about the 4th day of August, 1902, I met in front of my office Hon. M. Higgins, jr., then mayor of this city, and Henry J. Schroff, city clerk. They stated to me that the board created for the purpose of selecting a site for a naval training station on the Great Lakes would arrive at Hotel Racine in a few moments; that carriages were then over at the station for them. In about five minutes the carriages drove up, containing Admiral H. C. Taylor, Lieut. Commander Winslow, Civil Engineer H. H. Rousseau, and, I think, a Captain Young, together with W. H. Kranz, president of the Business Men's Association of this city, and Mr. Lloyd, agent for the Chicago and Northwestern Railway. The parties alighted, but did not go into the hotel. They were introduced to his honor the mayor, City Clerk Schroff, and myself, and about this time we were joined by Congressman H. A. COOPER and Clarence Snyder, of this city, who had just returned from Kenosha. After chatting a few moments on general subjects, the question came up as to how much time could be devoted to Racine.

I think that the remark was made by Admiral Taylor that they had only about thirty minutes to spend here, and that he would like to get a definite idea of our harbor and harbor facilities. The party then entered the carriages and was driven up North Main street to High and from High street east to the lake shore, from which point a splendid view of Racine Bay and harbor may be obtained. While standing there I pointed out to Admiral Taylor North Point, and called his attention to the fact that on the south side of the point there was a large slough or creek which empties into the lake and where a splendid inland harbor could be constructed at a comparatively small cost. The party declined to drive up there, which was about a mile and a half distant, and inspect the premises, assigning as a reason that they had not sufficient time, but that they would return later in the season and devote as much time as was necessary in order to make a complete and thorough investigation of the site. On their first trip to this city there was no site inspected, and there was no site mentioned or offered excepting the "North Point" site. There positively was no site offered or inspected at the point where we stopped, it being in a thickly settled portion of the city. When I mentioned the North Point site to Admiral Taylor, he called the attention of H. H. Rousseau, the recorder of the board, to the statements which I had made and requested him to make a memorandum of the same, and promised to devote ample time for the inspection of the site when they returned later in the season.

On the 31st day of October, 1902, I received the following telegram from Lake Forest, Ill.: "R. M. Boyd: Naval Training Station board will reach Racine about 3 o'clock to-day." We had carriages waiting at the Northwestern Depot at 3 o'clock. The members of the board were detained, and my recollection is did not reach the Northwestern Depot until about 4.30. It was represented to them that on account of the lateness of their arrival it would be impossible to reach the site at North Point and thoroughly inspect it, and they were requested to come over to the hotel, remain all night, and make the inspection the next morning. They declined to do so absolutely, for the reason that they were traveling on schedule time and must be in Sheboygan that night; that they were to inspect a site at Sheboygan early the next morning and leave for some other destination. The drive was made to North Point as fast as could possibly be done. When we arrived there the lamps were lighted in the farmhouses. We stopped a moment at the bridge that crosses the creek or slough on the south line of North Point, and then proceeded up to a point a little north of the light-house, and then drove on the highway to a point nearly to the west line of the proposed site. Turning there, we retraced our steps and returned to the city.

From a point near the light-house the electric lights in the city and the harbor lights were plainly visible. Upon this occasion I called the attention of the board to a site lying east of the highway on which we traveled going to North Point and beginning about three-quarters of a mile north of the city limits, and extending up to what is known as the "Three-mile road." The members of the board did not stop or alight from the carriages to inspect this site, but looked at it as they drove along the highway. It is known on their report as "North Point Site B." On this occasion is the only time that the attention of the board was called to that site, except through correspondence.

My commission expires February 4, 1906.

City Clerk Henry J. Schroff swears that on August 4, 1902, he was a member of the committee which accompanied the board to the lake bank at the east end of High street, from which point the site recommended to the board by the committee was pointed out as lying just west of North Point light-house; that no other site than the North Point site was referred to or recommended on that day; that after a few minutes spent in conversation the board were driven to the station, and that, to the best of his belief, not more than forty-five minutes were consumed from the arrival of the board in Racine until their departure. Mr. Schroff swears that on their second visit, the board being late in arriving, they were informed by the citizens' committee that to visit the site at such an hour would be doing injustice to it and to the citizens of Racine; that the board were invited to remain over night and view the site by daylight, but informed the citizens' committee that it would be impossible for them to do so, as they had to be in Milwaukee that evening to leave for some point farther north. Mr. Schroff adds that the board were then driven to North Point as speedily as possible, but arrived there when it was too dark to make an inspection of the site.

The affidavit of Mr. Schroff is as follows:

CITY CLERK'S OFFICE,
Racine, Wis., February 25, 1904.

STATE OF WISCONSIN, Racine County, ss:

Henry J. Schroff, city clerk of the city of Racine, deposeth and says that on or about August 4, 1902, he was one of the said officers which received the committee which was appointed by the naval board to select a site for a naval training school on the west shore of Lake Michigan, said committee being composed of Admiral Taylor, Lieutenant-Commander Winslow, and H. H. Rousseau.

The said committee on their arrival were taken in carriages from Hotel Racine across Main Street Bridge, up North Main street to High street, east on High street to the lake bank, from which point they viewed the Racine Harbor, and the site recommended to the board by the citizens' committee was pointed out to them as lying just west of Wind Point light-house. No other site than the one referred to was recommended outside of the one just mentioned. That possibly ten or fifteen minutes were spent in conversation, after which the visiting party were taken west on High street, south on Milwaukee avenue, west on State street to the Northwestern Depot, where the citizens' committee bade farewell to the visiting committee, and were promised that said board would return to Racine at a later date and give the proposition a thorough consideration. That to the best of my belief no more than forty-five minutes were consumed from the time the said committee arrived until their departure.

That on the second visit the committee were several hours late in arriving, and were informed by the citizens' committee that to go and view the site at so late an hour in the day would be doing an injustice to the site proposed and to the citizens of Racine. They were requested to remain over night and view the site in daylight. The citizens' committee, however, were informed that that would be impossible, as the said visiting committee must be in Milwaukee that evening to leave for some point farther north.

Under these conditions the citizens' committee with the visiting committee drove out to North Point, and the trip was made as speedily as the horses could possibly make it. The horses were of a superior quality to those usually found in a first-class livery stable. In this respect there was no time lost.

It was too dark to see sufficiently to do justice to the citizens of Racine or the committee appointed to select a naval training school site for the United States Government.

Clerk Municipal Court Racine County, Notary Public.

Mr. Chairman, there is one other bit of evidence of great significance to which I wish now to refer. It is a letter indicating with certainty that the board had selected the Lake Bluff site before it made its second visit to Racine. I have here a copy of the letter which was written by the president of the board on October 24, 1902, one week prior to their last visit to Racine. I procured it at the United States Geological Survey.

The letter is as follows:

BOARD OF GREAT LAKES NAVAL TRAINING STATION,
NAVY DEPARTMENT ANNEX,
Washington, D. C., October 24, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a copy of the board's letter, No. 275, of September 29, to the Department, and of a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury of August 15, forwarded with the Department's first indorsement of October 17; and, with the Department's approval, to request that the authority of the honorable the Secretary of the Interior be asked for the United States Geological Survey to make, if convenient, a topographical survey of a tract of land about 360 acres, south of Waukegan, Ill., shown on the inclosed blueprint, and referred to in the inclosed letters, all expenses in connection therewith to be defrayed by the Navy Department from the special appropriation at its disposal for this purpose, and in the method outlined in the inclosed letter, if the latter is approved by the Department. The survey is desired as soon as possible. Five-foot contours should be shown on the map, which should be drawn on a scale of not less than 500 feet to an inch. The cleared and wooded portions should be distinguished, and it is also desired to have the map show the location of the 10, 20, and 30 foot contours below the level of the lake surface in front of this property.

Very respectfully,
H. C. TAYLOR,
Rear-Admiral, United States Navy, Senior Member of Board.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Navy Department.

The request contained in this letter was complied with. Experts from the Office of the Geological Survey made a topographical survey of the Lake Bluff site. This survey was drawn to a scale, and showed contours of the site and of those below the level of the lake surface in front of it, the clear and wooded portions, and all other details. It was not an ordinary survey, but a topographical survey made by Government experts. These experts informed me that it was the only survey made by that Office upon the request of this board.

Mr. Chairman, there is only one conclusion to be drawn from this letter and the making of this survey, and that is that the Lake Bluff site had been selected at least one week before the board last visited the city of Racine. Concerning this I have no further comments to make.

So much for the first board. Congress directed that another board be appointed. This board visited the various sites. Afterwards it had a hearing in this city, at which it was announced that the Lake Bluff site, about 170 acres, would be donated to the Government. If they believed that Lake Bluff was the best site, why was it necessary to give it to the Government? The Government had appropriated the money to buy what it wanted. Why not submit to a fair competition? That second board told us repeatedly at Racine that they wanted from 350 to 500 acres. They took 170 acres. The station must eventually have more land, and the people who have it to sell will get what they ask. Who donated this site? Only last week one of the daily papers in my city contained an item about the annual report of the Chicago and Milwaukee Electric Railroad, from which I read as follows:

It is interesting to know that the railroad company gave $25,000 toward the purchase of the site for the Naval Training Station in North Chicago, a fact which up to this time has never been made public.

I knew nothing about Senator ALGER being down there. I had only a short time before returned from a trip to the Orient when I read this Tribune article. I have since conversed with the Senator, and he has told me of his being in Lake Forest and going to Lake Bluff. He declared that the odor from the lake at Lake Bluff and at Lake Forest was exceedingly disagreeable during his visits.

I wish to call attention to the fact that one of the original specifications was that the site should be capable of being easily isolated, and also that it should not be in a manufacturing district. This site can not be isolated at all. The north line of it joins the south line of North Chicago, a suburb devoted largely to manufacturers and that more and more will be a manufacturing district. There is no possible way to isolate the Lake Bluff site.

The new board has selected Lake Bluff. Instead of its being bought with the money appropriated by Congress, certain people, including an electric railroad company, presented it to the Government. Though only 170 acres, it cost a good deal more than a hundred thousand dollars. I do not know how much, but the query that naturally comes to a disinterested man is, Why, if Lake Bluff is such a superior site, was it necessary to make a donation of it to the United States Government?

Mr. VREELAND. I only desire to use two or three minutes in referring to the matter now before the committee. We all admire a good fighter, and I am sure my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] has shown that he belongs in the front row of that class. A good many Members of the House at present were not in the last Congress and are not familiar with the controversy which has existed in relation to this matter for the last few years. Several years ago Congress determined that it ought to have a naval training station upon the Great Lakes. We had one in Rhode Island; we had a small one down the coast. We found that we were getting the best material for the Navy from the Middle States of the great West. It was decided by Congress that we should have a naval station somewhere upon the chain of Great Lakes. The gentlemen will see at a glance that there would be many places competing for the establishment of the plant. I suppose there were eight or ten, and perhaps more, places brought to the attention of the Navy Department as suitable sites for this training station. I offered one, lying upon the shores of Lake Erie, in the district which I have the honor to represent; I think the very best site in the lot; and if the question is to be reopened I want to call attention again to the merits of that place.

A commission was appointed in the regular way by the Secretary of the Navy to look over the different sites and determine which was the best one for the Government to purchase. They decided that the site at Lake Bluff, all things considered, was the best one to buy.

They reported back to the Secretary of the Navy, and the report was approved and the matter came before Congress. It was brought here by those interested in some of the other sites. Congress, after a full hearing in the matter, decided that a new board should be appointed and that the matter should be gone over again. So a new board was appointed, and again the board of officers, presumably impartial, presumably interested as much as we in the welfare of the United States and its Navy, again decided that this site at Lake Bluff was the best one offered for this purpose.

The people of Chicago contributed the land, worth nearly $200,000. The Government of the United States has taken title to the property and a commandant has been appointed there. In the naval bill of last year we find the same appropriation of $20,000 for maintenance that we find in this bill. It would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is a closed incident as far as the location is concerned.

It seems to me that all that is left to the gentleman from Wisconsin is the time-honored right of every citizen of the United States that when the verdict goes against him he has a right to swear at the court. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from New York permit a question?

Mr. VREELAND. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What does the gentleman think of the report in the Chicago Tribune of the official investigation by the State board of health, and Professor Long, of the Northwestern University, both reporting the pollution of the water from a glucose factory and the great tanneries, and the disagreeable odor that it has? That's all I know about it.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that there was some trouble from a glucose factory, but the matter was called to the attention of the officials of the State, and it has been remedied.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Naval Affairs had before it the commandant of this proposed naval station. We went into the question of the water supply and the pollution of the water, and it is true that there was some contamination caused by a factory adjacent to the naval station at, however, a considerable distance. But the State authorities, we found, had promptly taken up the matter, and my understanding is that the nuisance has been abated, and that there is no trouble whatever, and that there is an abundant and unlimited supply of pure water for the use of this station.

Gentlemen, during the last Congress many of us will remember that my friend from Wisconsin occupied some two hours of the time of this House going into this matter thoroughly, going into it in detail, exhausting the subject, and that the matter was at that time brought before the House and considered settled. He went into it ably, as he always does everything which he undertakes. He presented all the merits of the case in favor of some other station being selected than Lake Bluff. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that after all this care and examination, after we have entered into possession of these premises, after we have spent many thousand dollars in putting them into perfect shape, it is too late to go back and again consider the question of where this station shall be located.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of striking this paragraph from the bill, but from different reasons than those urged by the gentleman from Wisconsin. There is at this station a farm with a barn and a few wooden buildings upon it, and there is asked $20,000 for maintenance for the coming fiscal year. There was no detailed estimate submitted to the Naval Committee, but in preparing the recommendation the officers took the language found in the bill for another training station and had that language inserted in this bill. So we find this paragraph authorizing expenditures for fire extinguishers, heat, lighting, furniture, stationery, books, periodicals, ice, expressage, packing boxes and materials, postage, telephone, and street-car fares. There is an architect employed up there designing and laying out a plan for this proposed naval training station.

Mr. VREELAND. May I interrupt my colleague?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. VREELAND. I want to say to my colleague that elsewhere in this bill is an appropriation for the purpose of entering upon the designs for which this site was intended, namely, the building of the necessary buildings, the equipping of it for the use for which the Government purchased it, for taking care of the men who are waiting to enter the service of the United States; that all of these things will, before the end of the year, and even at the present time, be necessary for the work that is to be carried on there for the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have an architect employed up there, unauthorized, as far as I can find any provision of law, preparing a general scheme for laying out this place. As the gentleman from New York says, further on in the bill there is a provision carrying $750,000 toward the completion of buildings which are to cost $2,000,000.

These buildings are to be used in training landsmen, as they are called, or apprentice seamen, who are not kept in the buildings more than six months. After that period of training they are sent to sea. In the provision authorizing the buildings there is no restriction upon the compensation to be paid to an architect, no adequate provision to prevent the extravagance such as we have had in connection with the building of the Naval Academy and Military Academy, nothing but this general authorization to expend $2,000,000 for buildings at the naval training station. Mr. Chairman, the least the House has the right to expect from a great committee when it comes in with a recommendation that $20,000 be appropriated for some purpose is that some adequate excuse be given for the appropriation. The only thing that I can find in the hearings before the Committee on Naval Affairs bearing upon this subject is the statement made by the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, and it is contained on one page of the printed hearings of the Naval Committee, and on that insignificant testimony they not only recommend $20,000 for maintenance, but they recommend $6,940 for clerks and other help in the office of the commandant. Where his office is to be established, and where these men are to do work and what their work is to be at a place where there are no buildings, no training station, in the correct sense of the term, it is difficult to find out. If there be money needed for the maintenance of this station during the coming year, I have no doubt that it should be appropriated, but it is customary to have some specific recommendation, some definite information upon which the House can act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I will read the testimony upon which these recommendations are submitted to the House.

Admiral CONVERSE. We have been working on that fund of $250,000. We have a naval captain there supervising the preparation of the general plans, and an architect preparing plans for buildings, and several engineers laying out the roads and the drainage. This appropriation is only for maintenance. There is nothing for buildings.

Mr. BUTLER. Beginning with July 1, 1906, this force will be absolutely necessary at this point?

Admiral CONVERSE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. And the men provided for in this section will be employed regularly?

Admiral CONVERSE. Yes, sir; under civil-service rules.

Mr. BUTLER. And will there be sufficient business to keep them occupied during business hours?

Admiral CONVERSE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RIXEY. Is it intended to confine this station to a recruiting station?

Admiral CONVERSE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RIXEY. It is not intended for a navy-yard?

Admiral CONVERSE. No, sir; simply for receiving recruits there preliminary to going on ships. We get a good many recruits from the Lakes now when the steamers are laid up, and Detroit, Cleveland, Chicago, Milwaukee, Duluth, and Superior are furnishing men all the time.

Mr. RIXEY. Is that used now as a recruiting station?

Admiral CONVERSE. No, sir; we have no accommodations for housing them.

Mr. RIXEY. When will it be ready?

Admiral CONVERSE. It depends upon what you will give us to put up the buildings.

Mr. KITCHIN. How far is that station from Chicago?

The CHAIRMAN. It is about 35 miles, I think. You say you will need these men there this coming year?

Admiral CONVERSE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Can we safely reduce this estimate?

Admiral CONVERSE. We put in the estimate exactly as asked for by Captain Ross.

Mr. VREELAND. Is there an appropriation for buildings?

Admiral CONVERSE. Not yet; it is to be submitted. It is to be estimated for.

The CHAIRMAN. You have submitted it on page 87 of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. What Department will that come under, the Bureau of Navigation?

Admiral CONVERSE. Yes, sir; but not in my time. After my successor has been appointed.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is the commandant?

Admiral CONVERSE. Captain Ross. He is in town and can appear before the committee if you so desire.

Mr. VREELAND. Where are you going to keep this live stock?

Admiral CONVERSE. We have a barn there. There were two or three buildings there when the property was transferred; it was quite a farm.

Now, I did not find any testimony of Captain Ross in such of the hearings as I have been able to obtain. I may have overlooked it; but if it be no more specific than this testimony, or if there be no more definite information than this testimony indicates, I should like to know upon what the House is asked to appropriate $20,000 for "ice and periodicals and stationery, fire extinguishers, and the like, for street-car fare," and also $6,940 "for clerical and other help."

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the gentleman, he offers criticism of the Naval Committee for making an appropriation based upon one page of the hearings. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that if he will look at page 167 of the hearings he will find for each of the next twenty-seven pages continual hearings upon this subject by the commandant at this station.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, Mr. Chairman, very much to my misfortune, upon applying at the Committee on Naval Affairs for a copy of the hearings on this bill the pages to which the gentleman refers were among those the committee were unable to furnish to me; so that Members of the House are not to be criticised for not finding all of the testimony submitted to the committee; but the fact is that there are there on this farm a barn and two or three wooden buildings, and $20,000 is asked for maintenance, while for the maintenance of the naval training station at Rhode Island, where they have men under training and where they are doing effective work, the total appropriation for maintenance is $71,000, and the total appropriation for maintenance at the California station is $50,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it may be necessary to appropriate $26,940 for maintenance and clerical help at this place before they have even commenced to erect a building; but if it be, I would like the House to consider how much will be required after the erection of the contemplated buildings, to cost not to exceed $2,000,000. I should like to know what provision the committee has made to prevent the exorbitant fees and charges of architects in the erection of this establishment. We had some experience in connection with the Naval Academy. In order to prevent a repetition of it when it was proposed to reconstruct the Military Academy at West Point, a specific sum was appropriated for architects' fees. Nobody has complained that the Government suffered particularly from that practice, although there was considerable discontent upon the part of the architects throughout the country. This is the time when these appropriations must be carefully scrutinized, because when it is started, as Members of the House well know, it will be impossible ever to cut them down.

Mr. PALMER. What is the use of expending $2,000,000 for a naval training station where recruits are to be received and kept for a few weeks and then forwarded to the service? What is the use of spending that large amount of money for a place like that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the gentleman is in great error. They are to be kept there for about six months.

Mr. PALMER. How many will be there at a time?

Mr. ROBERTS. Ultimately about 2,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And they evidently intend to have very palatial quarters, and when they are trained and sent on board a ship and confined in the quarters they will be compelled to live in on board I predict that the desertions will increase at a rate that will astound the House and the country.

These training stations should be very simple affairs. We are not establishing a great university—that is, nobody imagined that such was the intention of Congress. I suppose, though, that we will have a magnificent granite and marble building in which men who are to be given a few months' preparatory training for life on board a ship as ordinary seamen or as landsmen are to be equipped for that work.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. There are practically 25 per cent more men here than at Annapolis. The buildings there cost $10,000,000, and this whole outfit will cost two millions, so we are only spending 20 per cent of the money on the men who do the real work of the Navy as against what we are spending for the training of cadets at Annapolis, and it seems to me that it is out of proportion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. At the Naval Academy we have the most highly scientific course of any institution in the world. Men are being trained to officer the Navy, to spend their lives in it. They spend four or five years at the academy. The men who are to receive this preliminary training are enlisted for three or five years, and the rule is that after one term of enlistment they look for some other more congenial occupation. If the only defense for expending $2,000,000 for a training station is that Congress in some way or another was prevailed upon to expend $10,000,000 upon the Naval Academy, then it is the poorest defense I have ever heard urged for an appropriation.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Nevertheless is it not a fact that the percentage of reenlistments of the American Navy is greater than any other navy in the world?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I do not know; but I do know this, that up to this time, with the exception, I think, of the training station at Newport, R. I., all of the men and the apprentice boys, who have reflected such glory and credit upon themselves and upon the Navy, have been trained on training ships, ships which were useless for any other purpose. Under this new dispensation, however, it is necessary to give them better accommodations than I or many other man had when we were attending college, and I am opposed to such a scheme because I think it is an unjustifiable extravagance.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. May I say——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Do you not think taking these green boys, landsmen, and putting them aboard these ships has been the cause of desertions very largely?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not; and I say, moreover, that after you get them out of this palatial training school and put them on board ship they will quit the first time they get to land, and you can not hold them. [Applause.]

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. No; they quit because they are in these old hulks being trained; they quit before they are trained.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I agree with much the gentleman from New York has stated, and I will do him the credit to state that he is one of the few men on this proposition who is consistent. He opposed it in the beginning. I remember very well when this proposition first came up. I opposed it in the Committee on Naval Affairs and opposed it on the floor. It first went out on a point of order, raised, I believe, by the gentleman from Ohio. The provision for the naval training station was then placed in the bill by the Senate. When it came to the House there was a motion made to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment. I was opposed to the whole proposition, and was one of those who voted in the negative, as was the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], and the motion was defeated and the amendment was rejected. The matter then went to conference, and, while pending in conference, some amendment was made, which was satisfactory, not to everybody, because, so far as I was concerned, I was opposed to it upon principle, believing that there was no necessity for a naval training station on the Great Lakes, where you could not have, under the treaty with Great Britain, any battle ships; but my recollection is that when that compromise proposition came from the committee of conference the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] supported it, and it seems to me that he should abide by his agreement. Now, the proposition which he supported—and if I am incorrect he can correct me—provided as follows:

Naval Training Station, Great Lakes: The purchase of land and the establishment of a naval training station on the Great Lakes, $250,000. The President is hereby authorized and empowered to appoint a board consisting of not less than three members, none of whom shall be a resident of any State bordering on the Great Lakes, whose duty it shall be to select the most available site for such naval training station on the Great Lakes, and having selected such a site, to ascertain and report its probable cost and the probable expenditure which will be necessary for improving the same, including lake shore protection and construction of necessary harbor facilities, and make a detail report of the findings and proceedings to the President, who, on approval of such report, shall authorize the purchase of such site and establishment of such naval training station.

Now, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] supported that proposition. He took his chances on it, and because he is defeated he now comes to attack this whole provision. So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to the provision upon principle——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion right there?

Mr. RIXEY. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I had no thought of opposing it at all, until I saw in the Chicago Tribune on the front page the report of the examinations of these expert chemists as to the pollution of the water, that the odor was unbearable and declared a nuisance. Then, inasmuch as you wanted a bathing place at the training site, I supposed if anything smelled so bad that you could not live near it, it would not be a pleasant place in which to bathe.

Mr. RIXEY. I will state to the gentleman that so far as I am concerned I do not believe in a naval station or a bathing place on the Great Lakes. I believe the recruits ought to be sent to the coast and have their training in the ships in which they are to serve. But the House thought differently, and Congress ordered differently, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] had his opportunity to present the advantages of the site which he advocated; and he is here complaining to-day because that site was not selected by the Board.

Mr. SPARKMAN. How many of these naval training schools have we?

Mr. RIXEY. We have two or three. We have one in California, one in Rhode Island, and then one at Norfolk, or rather it is used as such.

Mr. SPARKMAN. In what particular do these training schools differ from the training on the training ships?

Mr. RIXEY. I presume it is the same thing. My view was that they ought to be sent to the ships where they could get that training. But Congress thought differently. Congress, after an elaborate discussion and consideration, decided in favor of establishing this station on the Great Lakes, and at this particular point, as I understand.

Now, as to whether any money will be appropriated for it, that is another matter; but I do think, so far as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is concerned, he has had his day, he has taken his chances, and it now ill becomes him to complain of the selection of this site.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, I am one of the Members of this House who voted for the establishment of a training station on the shore of the Great Lakes, because I believed that by such an establishment the Navy would secure recruits of a character most likely to do good service—men from the sturdy West, many of them accustomed to the water from youth, and who would prove efficient in the service. It is important to encourage enlistments from that section of the country, the breeding place of hardy, patriotic Americans.

Now, as to the advantage of training these young men on shore rather than in ships, that is a controversy which has been considered in Congress time and again, but in recent years it has been conceded that the first training of these recruits should be on land, for reasons which it is not necessary for me to mention now. As has been stated by my colleague from Virginia, the question was fully considered by Congress as to whether such training station should be established at Lake Bluff, in Illinois, or at some other point on the Great Lakes. I do not think, sir, that there has been a matter brought before this Congress that was discussed more fully and more thoroughly and with more heat than was this one, two or three years ago. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] occupied a great deal of time in this connection, and with his usual vigor and persistency brought before the House every argument that was available in favor of the establishment at some other point, within the limits of his own State. Two commissions were appointed to investigate the relative merits of the various competing places.

There is no reason to believe that these commissions were in any way partial to any of these particular sites. The first was headed by Admiral Taylor, now deceased, an officer of the very highest character and ability, a man who would scorn to show preference unless that preference was justified. The President approved the findings of the second commission, also in favor of Lake Bluff, doubtless after a careful review of the reports connected therewith. There is certainly no reason to suppose the President acted without full consideration of the merits of the various places. In my judgment, the entire matter has been settled, and I can not conceive why the gentleman from Wisconsin comes now and seeks to overturn what has been so thoroughly discussed and, to my mind and to the mind of most of the Members who are familiar with the history of this legislation, established beyond the peradventure of further useful discussion.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the motion to "strike out" the paragraph will be voted down. The interest of the Navy will be best promoted by such action.

[Mr. KINKAID addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have not taken any special interest in the subject of the naval station except in a very general way; but the remarks of my distinguished friend from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] in reference to the contamination of the water at Lake Bluff opened a new channel of thought. I regret very much that he did not make this speech some time ago. The United States Supreme Court has been engaged for several years in considering the question as to the contamination of the water supply in St. Louis by reason of the flow of water down the Illinois River, which comes through the drainage canal at Chicago. If the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin had made his discovery and announced it to the world before that case was closed, it would have been possible for the city of Chicago in its controversy with St. Louis to prove that the contamination of the water supply of St. Louis came from Waukegan and Kenosha, because the water which he has complained of at Lake Bluff, which he says is so contaminated and has such vile odor, is water that goes down the western shore of Lake Michigan until it reaches Chicago and then goes down the Chicago River and then down the drainage canal and Illinois River to St. Louis. It would have been a remarkable discovery to have brought to the attention of the Supreme Court of the United States. St. Louis and the State of Missouri, thinking that it was the sewage from Chicago which was contaminating the water there, would have learned that the great discoverer from Wisconsin had brought to the attention of the world the fact that the supply of contaminated water came from Lake Bluff.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Illinois. I ask three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. I hope he will have all the time he wants.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the elaborate argument of the distinguished gentleman, the constitutional argument, which he has seen fit to submit to the House, I desire to say that the "gentleman from Wisconsin" has not made any "discovery," except to have found on the front page of the Chicago Tribune what purported to be a statement of a member of the State board of health, and also a statement of a professor of the Northwestern University as to the pollution of the water at Lake Bluff, caused by the gluten that came from the glucose factory, the only glucose factory in that vicinity, at Waukegan, 4 miles distant. It is not a discovery of the "gentleman from Wisconsin," but a plain statement of two unbiased, professional experts as to the pollution of the water at Lake Bluff. It is not a discovery on my part, but a statement of facts by chemists. So that the gentleman's eloquent, elaborate, and profound discussion of the Constitution and the law, when he alluded to me, was merely an airing of his own wisdom in reference to this matter, and wholly irrelevant.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how the gentleman could think of it as an argument on constitutional law. Probably he would not recognize it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman spoke of something that was done in the Supreme Court. I will say law and strike out the "Constitution."

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word about this proposition, and only a word. This matter was very thoroughly discussed two years ago on the floor of this House, and every objection which has been made here as to the site selected by the different boards was made then, and, I think, made a great deal better then than now. There have been two commissions appointed for the purpose, and they have unanimously selected the site. The Navy of the United States wanted another training station. They have one on the Pacific coast; they have got another at Newport, R. I., and they wanted one in the Great Lakes somewhere. So a naval board was first commissioned to examine and select the site. Then a second commission was appointed, Mr. Chairman, which consisted of a majority of civilians, and they unanimously selected this site, and the President of the United States has approved of it, the title has been taken to the property, and the work has been going on. Admiral Converse, in his report, says that "the work should be expedited on the new training station about to be established at Lake Bluff, near Chicago, and when it is completed a present pressing want will be relieved."

Now, we all know that one of the most pressing questions in the Navy to-day is securing a good personnel and the training of the personnel. We propose to make this as good a station as the one at Newport. We sent a commission over to Europe a few years ago to visit the different training stations and the methods of training men in the foreign navies. It is proposed to make this a model training station for the men behind the guns—the enlisted men. It is the only naval institution which we have or will have out on the Great Lakes.

We have navy-yards along the Atlantic coast, along the Gulf, and along the Pacific coast, and we will have but this one naval station on the Great Lakes, and I think it ought to be a good station. I think it ought to be a first-class station in every respect. It is located near the heart of the great center of our country, from which to-day come the best men who enter the American Navy.

Something has been said here to-day because the citizens of Chicago subscribed $172,000 and gave this site to the United States Government. They are patriotic people in Chicago, and a number of years ago, when it was proposed to locate there an Army post, the citizens of Chicago went down into their pockets and subscribed more than $300,000 and purchased the land and gave it to the United States Government. With the same degree of patriotism, from no other motive than a sentiment of love for the Navy and devotion to the flag, they have in this case already contributed this large sum of money and turned the property over to the United States Government. [Applause.]

Now, the Government of the United States having agreed to establish a station of this sort and having taken the property subscribed and paid for by the citizens of Chicago, I say to you that it would be unjust for it not to go ahead and establish and build this naval training station. [Applause.]

I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out the paragraph.

The question being taken; and the motion was rejected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In line 16, I move to strike out "twenty thousand dollars" and insert "ten;" so that it will read "ten thousand dollars." I do this, Mr. Chairman, in view of the very elaborate and apparently satisfactory explanation of the necessity for this particular appropriation by the gentlemen who have spoken in behalf of this establishment. They have convinced me, at least, that probably they can get along with $10,000 a year at this station for these incidental expenses, including "periodicals, stationery, books, street-car fares," and other matters, when so far as we are aware there is practically no necessity for any more.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I want to say for the benefit of the committee that this item of $20,000 does not altogether refer to the items mentioned by the gentleman from New York, but it also includes labor and materials and the preparation of the ground, and it would seem to me that this is a very small amount of money to be appropriated in that way, and it would, in my judgment, cripple the expenditure of the item further on in the bill as well as that which was appropriated last year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman think it proper to make any very great expenditure in preparing these grounds until the plans have been approved for the buildings that are to be erected there?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. The plans are prepared.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The language here does not indicate that.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Not on that appropriation, but on the other they are, and the need there is for the improvement of the grounds.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I call the gentleman's attention to the statement that the architect at this place is preparing the plans; and if he is preparing them, they certainly are not prepared. They can not be approved until they are prepared, and until that happens it seems to me very indiscreet to attempt to lay out the grounds.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. The grounds must necessarily be laid out with a view to the construction of certain buildings, and so far as the actual laying out on paper is concerned that has been done, for I have seen it myself, and, as I understand, some of this appropriation is to be made use of in that connection.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. This appropriation will not be available until July 1.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me ask the gentleman from Connecticut for what has the $250,000 already appropriated been expended? The gentleman is on the committee and gave this a great deal of attention.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I have not that information.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to know somebody who has that information and can give it.

Mr. FOSS. In Captain Ross's testimony before the committee, which the gentleman can have——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman knows that he gave me all the testimony I could get in the committee, and that was not among it. I applied to the gentleman personally.

Mr. FOSS. I gave the gentleman the testimony that he wanted, the testimony of the bureau chief.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I wanted the testimony taken on this bill.

Mr. FOSS. I think the gentleman must be mistaken. Here is the statement of the expenditures in the testimony of Captain Ross.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will ask the gentleman how much has been expended.

Mr. FOSS. Up to January 1, 1906, $11,912.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And so they had left $239,000.

Mr. FOSS. That was on January 1, 1906.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They had $239,000 left, and that is in addition to the $20,000 that is appropriated. Now, I hope, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that $250,000 was appropriated in the act of 1904, and the balance, amounting on the 1st of January of this year to $239,000, is still available, that the committee will join me in reducing this appropriation by $10,000, because all of this other money is available for the same purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For clerical force in the office of commandant as follows: One clerk, at $1,200; one clerk, at $1,000; one draftsman, at $1,500; one subinspector, at $1,500; one foreman of laborers, at $1,200; one messenger, at $540; in all, $6,940. In all, naval training station, Great Lakes, $26,940.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I suppose there is no claim on the part of the members of the committee that two clerks, a draftsman, and subinspector could be overworked at this place inasmuch as of that $250,000, which has been available for over a year, they have only been able to expend $11,000. The amount of supervision that will be necessary at this station and the necessary clerical help that will be required will hardly need an appropriation of over $6,000. It may be necessary in view of what it is contemplated will eventually be done there; but it seems to me to be unnecessary to authorize the entire office equipment before the erection of the buildings has been commenced. Under these conditions I move that this provision be stricken from the bill.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has unintentionally misstated the whole question. The proposition here is simply a provision for the maintenance of the station—$20,000. That is separate and apart from the $250,000, which goes toward the construction and equipment of the station—an entirely different proposition. The gentleman is trying to throw in here, from lack of information, the idea that we are trying in some way to secure more money than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman charges me with an attempt to mislead the committee. That statement is hardly accurate. In the law, if the gentleman will read it, he will find an appropriation of $250,000 which is available for the purpose of preparing and equipping this station. I challenge the gentleman to read the law and see if I am not correct. The appropriation that has been passed for maintenance "includes repairs and improvements of the ground," and if the $250,000 that was appropriated was not available for that purpose I will ask the gentleman from Illinois to state from what fund they have obtained the money with which they have been doing the identical work for which this $20,000 is granted.

The gentleman does not answer the reasons urged for striking out the appropriation for clerical help. I stated that the committee had provided an office equipment here for a place not in existence. The gentleman charges me with having attempted to mislead the House into the belief that the appropriation already made and passed was available for a purpose for which it was not. I call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that at least the House has a right to expect, when a motion is made to strike out an appropriation for clerical help, which is new in this bill, that the gentleman give one substantial reason for incorporating the provision in the bill. It may be that he has done so, but if he has it has escaped my observation.

Mr. FOSS. Evidently it has escaped the gentleman's observation. In the statement of Admiral Converse, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, in the latter part of it—page 121 of the hearings—is inserted the report of the commandant of the station. It says: "One clerk at $1,200; this clerk is required in the construction, records, general office work, including all work under the engineer's direction. One stenographer at $1,000; this is needed not only in the office of the commandant, but for all correspondence, and for the correspondence of any other officers stationed here—also as a file and record clerk. One draftsman at $1,500; this draftsman is absolutely necessary, and will be needed after the construction of the building is completed;" and so it goes on all through. There is a reason for everything given here, and the only trouble is that the gentleman has not been able to make himself familiar with the facts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is reading from the estimate that was submitted. If the gentleman's committee is in the habit of accepting the estimates transmitted from a Department as sufficient justification for appropriations, and if that practice was followed by every other committee that has jurisdiction over appropriation bills, the Government of the United States would be bankrupt in one year. I ask the gentleman not to read from the estimates, but to give one good, substantial reason for the appropriation for a clerical force at a place where there is to-day only a barn and two or three wooden buildings, although it is contemplated in this bill to authorize the construction of new buildings.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordnance and ordnance stores: For procuring, producing, preserving, and handling ordnance material for the armament of ships; for fuel, material, and labor to be used in the general work of the Ordnance Department; for watchmen at magazines, powder factories, and powder depots; for furniture in ordnance buildings at navy-yards and stations; for maintenance of the proving ground and powder factory, and for target practice, $3,500,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "dollars," in line 6, page 11, the following: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for shells and projectiles, except for shells and projectiles purchased in accordance with the terms and conditions of proposals submitted by the Secretary of the Navy to all the manufacturers of such shells and projectiles and upon bids received and accepted in accordance with the terms and requirements of such proposals."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am advised by the Secretary of the Navy that there is expended annually about $500,000 out of this appropriation for shells and projectiles, and that it has not been the practice of the Department heretofore to invite bids or submit proposals to the various establishments manufacturing projectiles and shells; that these contracts are let to the establishment which, in the judgment of the Department, it seems best and advisable that the contract should be given. I think, with all due respect to the Committee on Naval Affairs, that Congress should place some limitation upon this discretion which has heretofore been invested in and exercised by the Navy Department. There are different manufacturing establishments engaged in the manufacture of these projectiles, and it is but reasonable to suppose that if the Navy Department is required to invite bids or to submit proposals upon which bids are invited for the manufacture of these projectiles, the Government will pay less than we are paying now under the present system, which is to give the contract to any establishment that may be able to secure the favor of the Department. There is no reason why an exception should be made in the matter of the purchase of an item involving an expenditure of half a million of dollars annually from the practice which is pursued in the purchase of any other item that is necessary in the administration of any of the other Departments of the Government. I regret that I do not have at hand the letter which I received from the Secretary of the Navy upon this subject, but I have stated in substance what it is, and I can see no reason why an exception should be made, as I say, in this particular item, the purchase of which involves so much money as the purchase of projectiles.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. FOSS. Did the Secretary of the Navy write the gentleman a letter approving this provision?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; he did not, because "the gentleman" did not ask for his approval. I merely asked for information. There are two classes of projectiles. Proposals for the one are submitted and bids are invited. Under that class about $46,000, if my memory serves me right, was expended during the last fiscal year; but under the other class, for which there was expended during the last fiscal year something like $446,000, no proposals were submitted and no bids were invited, although the Secretary of the Navy, who admits that there are several manufacturing establishments engaged in the manufacture of these projectiles, refused to award the contract to any one of them.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTS. What is the nature of the projectiles for which the large sum is expended?

Mr. TAWNEY. The large projectiles.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Manufactured by what concern?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know. The Secretary of the Navy does not state the firm that is manufacturing them for the Government, although he does state in his letter that there are several establishments engaged in their manufacture. I can see no objection to the amendment. I think it is a reasonable proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman if any part of this half million dollars is expended for torpedoes?

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

Mr. ROBERTS. Only for projectiles used in the guns?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; for the shells and projectiles; and if this limitation is placed upon this provision it also ought to be placed on the provision on the same page, which is a new provision, providing for the purchase of a certain amount of reserve shells and projectiles.

Mr. ROBERTS. I would like to ask the gentleman one other question. Has he heard or does he know of any complaints from manufacturers of these projectiles that they do not have the opportunity to furnish the Government with their own manufacture?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have none; I have no complaint. This is not in the interest of any manufacturing establishment. I do not offer this amendment at the request of anybody; but in looking over the appropriations I saw this large sum appropriated for this purpose, and I sought information from the Secretary of the Navy as to how these expenditures were made and learned from him, as I have stated, that the purchases were made, except in one particular class of projectiles, for which we expended $46,000 last year, in the discretion of the Department, regardless of the price and without inviting bids.

Mr. HULL. Without any bids?

Mr. TAWNEY. Without any bids whatever.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. As I understood you, you made the statement that several other firms were engaged in the manufacture of these kinds of shells.

Mr. TAWNEY. That was the information which the Secretary communicated to me in his letter, which I had here, but somebody must have picked it up.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Do you know who the purchasers are from the other firms?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Minnesota permit me to ask a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman perfectly satisfied to have this item passed over until to-morrow morning at 12 o'clock?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly; I have no objection.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I am sure the gentleman will not have any objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have no objection.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. We may be better informed by to-morrow.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts as to whether any firms have complained that they had not an opportunity to enter into a competition, I would say the Midvale Works, of Philadelphia, have so complained, that under the practice they had not the opportunity, the discretion being lodged in the Secretary, to enter competitive bids.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, may I renew my request that this item go over until to-morrow morning at 12 o'clock? The gentleman offering the amendment says it will be satisfactory to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the paragraph with amendment pending be passed without prejudice until to-morrow after the House goes into committee. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have no objection, Mr. Chairman, to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchase and manufacture of smokeless powder, $500,000.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 11, add the following: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the purchase of smokeless powder at a greater price than 60 cents per pound."

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, the hearings before the Committee on Naval Affairs disclosed the fact that no bids are called for when the Government has to purchase its powder. The course adopted is a most unsatisfactory one. The Department notifies the powder manufacturer to furnish so much powder upon the general and continuing understanding that it will pay 70 cents a pound. Admiral Mason, head of the Ordnance Bureau, stated that there was practically no competition in regard to the furnishing of smokeless powder; that the Department fixed the price at which this powder was to be furnished, and that the factories furnished the powder at the price which the Department said was reasonable.

Now, this amendment simply provides that the Department, instead of paying what it has been, 70 cents a pound, shall not pay in excess of 60 cents a pound. I hope that there will be no trouble in the committee in accepting this amendment, because it is manifestly just in the light of the evidence which we have recently had. The question as to the price of powder has recently been investigated by the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate. That committee had hearings, and, as I understand it, the result of those hearings is that smokeless powder can be manufactured at 35 or 40 cents a pound. The cost to manufacture powder at the Government plant at Indian Head, Admiral Mason says, is 60 cents a pound, which includes an allowance of 10 per cent for depreciation of plant and 6 per cent insurance. This is a most liberal allowance for depreciation and for insurance. I understand that insurance can be secured for 2 per cent, and there is no reason why the land should depreciate at all, much less 10 per cent.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the demand for navy-yard construction is always met with the statement that the private contractors can build cheaper than the Government, so much cheaper that the private contractors can build for the same price that it costs the Government and have a good profit besides. That is a contention we hear every year when the naval bill comes up and we reach the question of the increase of the Navy. If this contention of the private contractors is approximately true, why not apply it to the question of powder? With the Government plant at Indian Head run to only one-half to two-thirds its capacity and with allowances for depreciation and insurance, it would seem that the cost to the Government would be a liberal allowance to a private contractor. In addition, if we adopt this amendment limiting the price to 60 cents a pound, the Department will furnish the acid, which costs from 4 to 5 cents, and the powder will thus cost the Government 65 cents, instead of 75 cents, as it now does, while the Government can manufacture it for 60 cents.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIXEY. Admiral Mason in his statement said:

We have not asked for bids for some time in the Navy. We place the order with the different companies at the price of 70 cents, this price having been fixed by us as a result of our experience at Indian Head and accepted by the manufacturers.

Mr. RIXEY. You pay wherever you place the order 70 cents?

Admiral MASON. That is the price at present.

Mr. RIXEY. I understood that we had a provision which required that when powder or anything else was to be purchased for the supply of the Navy that it must be put out to the lowest bidder.

Admiral MASON. Ordnance and ammunition are exempt by law.

Mr. RIXEY. Don't you think it would be a wise course to pursue?

Admiral MASON. For the lowest bidder?

Mr. RIXEY. To call for bids.

Admiral MASON. I do not think anything would be gained by this. There are no other firms in the country which manufacture smokeless powder for large guns. The present manufacturers have very close business relations with one another and have always been willing to meet us in fixing the price of their product and to give us full facilities for examining their plants and keeping ourselves posted with regard to advances in methods of manufacture which might tend to cheapen production. We have once, at least, cut down the price, after conferring with the manufacturers, and they accepted our decision, though naturally not without some reluctance. It would be bad policy in connection with a matter so essentially military as this one of powder manufacture to accept anything but the very best that can be made, and we have felt that the only way to get this is to set the highest possible standard and hold the manufacturers up to this by rejecting without hesitation every pound of their product which does not come up to the requirements.

We can not do all this unless we are fair in the matter of price, and this is one of the greatest advantages about having a Government plant. We can follow up the cost of production at our own plant, and then, by allowing what seems a fair margin of profit for the outside manufacturers, we can agree on a price which will justify them in using the most improved methods at every point. The cost of production at Indian Head at present averages 60 cents a pound. This takes account of the capital invested—that is, the estimated cost of the plant—and allows for deterioration of plant, and insurance, the Government insuring itself.

It is stated in another place——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. How much does it cost the Government?

Mr. RIXEY. Sixty cents, and that is after allowing 10 per cent for deterioration of plant and 6 per cent for insurance.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. RIXEY. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is there any competition in the manufacture of smokeless powder whatever, and can there be competition?

Mr. RIXEY. Admiral Mason states there is very little competition.

Mr. TAWNEY. Has not your committee ascertained the fact that smokeless powder is manufactured under the terms and specifications of a patent obtained for its manufacture?

Mr. RIXEY. I think not. There is no such evidence.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman that I have the certified copies of the patents obtained by two naval officers, and those patents have been assigned to one of the constituent companies that generally manufactures smokeless powder, and in that assignment the patentee has reserved to the Navy Department a license to manufacture smokeless powder, and the Navy Department is the only establishment, or the Government itself can be the only competitor, in the United States for the manufacture of smokeless powder, for the reason that it is being manufactured under these two patents obtained by two naval officers, whose experiments were conducted out of appropriations made for the maintenance, or made for the torpedo station, I think, at Newport, R. I.

Mr. RIXEY. Smokeless powder is made down at Indian Head. There was no testimony whatever before the Committee on Naval Affairs in regard to any patents on smokeless powder.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have certified copies of them.

Mr. RIXEY. I know nothing of these patents, never saw them, and that question is not material to what we are considering. Admiral Mason was asked the question, "How many factories for smokeless powder have we in this country?" He answered, "We have a factory of our own at Indian Head. We have the International Smokeless Powder Company, the Du Pont Company, the Laflin & Rand Company, and the California Powder Company."

He then states that they have "very close business relations." The fact is that they have an agreement in regard to prices. It is for all practical purposes a trust. It controls the output and price on the sale of smokeless powder. The only protection the Government has is to place a limit on the price, and that is what the amendment proposes. It is a liberal allowance, and nothing but a monopoly would likely be dissatisfied with the price named. I shall be surprised if this committee shall indicate its unwillingness to place a limit upon the price to be charged by this monopoly. There ought not to be any objection to the adoption of the amendment. It is claimed elsewhere that the powder can be manufactured and sold at 35 to 40 cents. But giving the companies the benefit of all doubt, giving them the benefit of the statement made by the Chief of Ordnance, these companies can make smokeless powder and sell it to the Government at a profit at 60 cents a pound; and the amendment limits it to that price.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I think most of this appropriation goes toward the manufacture by the Government of smokeless powder. I think it is stated somewhere in the hearings, and I was trying to find it.

Mr. RIXEY. I want the limitation here; the provision is for "purchase and manufacture."

Mr. FOSS. I think some portion of it does go to the purchase. I should not want to agree to any action here that would entirely shut the Government out of powder. I hardly think it would be wise to agree to the gentleman's amendment, and I hope that it will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 40.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will proceed to count. [After counting.] One hundred and two Members present. So the point is overruled.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for tellers on the amendment.

The question was taken; and tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] will take their places as tellers.

The committee divided; and tellers reported—ayes 44, noes 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Reserve powder and shell: Toward the accumulation of a reserve supply of powder and shell, $1,000,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, it was my purpose to offer the same amendment to this paragraph that I offered to the paragraph at the head of this page. But that has gone over, and I ask unanimous consent that this be passed in the same way, without prejudice.

Mr. FOSS. I agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks that the paragraph just read be passed without prejudice, to be considered at the same time as the other paragraph which went over under like agreement. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Arming and equipping Naval Militia: For arms, accouterments, signal outfits, boats and their equipment, repairs to vessels loaned to States in accordance with law, coal and clothing, and the printing or purchasing of necessary books of instruction for the Naval Militia of the various States, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, $60,000.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 6, after the word "law," strike out the word "coal" and insert the word "fuel."

Mr. FOSS. I accept the amendment if the gentleman will put in the letter from the Secretary.

Mr. MEYER. This change is recommended by the Navy Department. Many of the launches used in the service of the Naval Militia of the different States require oil instead of coal for fuel. The change does not increase the appropriation.

The Secretary of the Navy approves it, as will appear from the following letter:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 2, 1906.

DEAR GENERAL: I respectfully invite your attention to the word "coal" as it appears in line 6, page 12, of H. R. 18750, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

As several of the States are using launches which require oil instead of coal for fuel, I beg to suggest that the word "fuel" be substituted for the word "coal," so that paragraph will read: * * * "fuel and clothing" * * * instead of * * * "coal and clothing" * * *.

This affects the States of Louisiana, Missouri, California, Illinois, and Connecticut.

Very respectfully, TRUMAN H. NEWBURY,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. ADOLPH MEYER, M. C.,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.
The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT.

Equipment of vessels: For hemp, wire, iron, and other materials for the manufacture of cordage, anchors, cables, galleys, and chains; canvas for the manufacture of sails, awnings, hammocks, and other work; water for all purposes on board naval vessels, including the expenses of transportation and storage of the same; stationery for chaplains and for commanding and navigating officers of ships, equipment officers on shore and afloat, and for the use of courts-martial on board ship; the removal and transportation of ashes from ships of war; interior appliances and tools for equipment buildings in navy-yards and naval stations; supplies for seamen's quarters; and for the purchase of all other articles of equipment at home and abroad, and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels and manufacture of equipment articles in the several navy-yards; all pilotage and towage of ships of war; canal tolls, wharfage, dock and port charges, and other necessary incidental expenses of a similar nature; services and materials in repairing, correcting, adjusting, and testing compasses on shore and on board ship; nautical and astronomical instruments, and repairs to same; libraries for ships of war, professional books and papers, and drawings and engravings for signal books; naval signals and apparatus, namely, signals, lights, lanterns, rockets, and running lights; compass fittings, including binnacles, tripods, and other appendages of ships' compasses; logs and other appliances for measuring the ship's way, and leads and other appliances for sounding; lanterns and lamps, and their appendages for general use on board ship for illuminating purposes, and oil and candles used in connection therewith; service and supplies for coast-signal service; bunting and other materials for making and repairing flags of all kinds; photographs, photographic instruments, and materials; musical instruments and music; installing, maintaining, and repairing interior and exterior signal communications and all electrical appliances of whatsoever nature on board naval vessels, except range finders, battle order and range transmitters and indicators, and motors and their controlling apparatus used to operate the machinery belonging to other bureaus, $3,000,000.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I move to strike out the last word, but I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD].

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 14, line 20, after the word "chains," insert "specifications for purchase thereof to be so prepared as shall give fair and free competition."

Mr. LOUD. In explanation of this amendment I will say that an investigation of the purchase of the material used at the Boston Navy-Yard for the manufacture of anchors and cables shows that an excessive price is being paid, owing to the unnecessary specifications, which absolutely rule out competition. For the last two years the materials purchased for the making of chains in that yard have been purchased invariably from one concern, to the amount of $244,000. Upon a reasonable specification, whereby fair competition could be had, at least $100,000 could be saved in this item, and the wording of the amendment only tends to give fair and free competition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. RIXEY. Will you allow the amendment to be reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment again.

The amendment was again reported, and was then agreed to.

Mr. LOUD. I have another amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, in line 7, after the words "navy-yards," insert "Provided, That anchors, chains, and cordage required shall be purchased in open market, unless all or any part of such material can be manufactured at equal or less cost in the Government shops."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, what is the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That it changes existing law. This is for the manufacture and equipment of articles in the several navy-yards. There is no provision for the purchase in open market.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the navy-yards are running, going enterprises, and this is an appropriation for the purchase of the equipment of the navy-yards under the existing law. It is a limitation upon the expenditure of the money provided in the bill itself. Unfortunately I have not the amendment before me, and I should like to have it read again, if there is no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman from Ohio know of any law which requires these things to be constructed in the navy-yards?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then how can it change existing law?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It does not change any existing law, and it is simply a limitation upon this expenditure.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no law authorizing this to be purchased in open market. This provision will make that law.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It has been suggested that the law of common honesty requires that fairness shall be manifested in the expenditure of this vast sum of money. Here are $3,000,000 appropriated, and it is very strange if Congress may not put a limitation upon the manner of its expenditure. Will the Chair accede to my proposition that this amendment be read again?

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be again read.

The Clerk read the amendment again.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that that amendment should be placed after the word "dollars," in line 6 on the next page. Then it would apply to the entire expenditure of the appropriation. The gentleman from Michigan can make the change, if he sees fit to do so.

Mr. LOUD. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the correction will be made in the amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no law that requires that these articles shall be manufactured in the navy-yards. It is an annual appropriation of money and this is a direction how it shall be expended. There is, therefore, no change of existing law, for there is no law on the subject, and it is simply a direction or limitation upon the expenditure of this vast sum of money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to call the attention of the Chair to a number of rulings that have been made in which it was attempted to restrict certain expenditures. It has been held that the limitation of the language directing ships to be built in navy-yards or that they be built by contract was new legislation and obnoxious to the rule. If there is no law existing now, this language creates new law, and that is not in order against the objection. If there be a law this changes the law, and that is equally objectionable. This language is mandatory and compels the purchase to be made under certain conditions at certain places, and that is new legislation within the rule.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, there is no law now directing that these various articles mentioned in this paragraph should be manufactured at any place or in any factory or navy-yard owned by the Government of the United States. Therefore this provision is a limitation—that is, they can not pay any more for these articles than the cost of manufacturing these articles in the factories owned by the Government itself, and to that extent it is a limitation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman explain how the Government can tell whether it can make these articles more cheaply than it can purchase them?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Government can ascertain that fact just as any business man can ascertain the cost of any product turned out of any kind of a manufacturing establishment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the point of order is overruled we will show you.

Mr. TAWNEY. The point I make is that the expenditure of the appropriation is limited by the proposed amendment—that is, the Government can not manufacture unless it can manufacture them as cheap or cheaper than the Government can go out in the open market and buy them. Without this limitation, and to prove that this is a limitation, if the cost of the manufacture of these articles in the United States Navy-Yard is 25 per cent greater than the cost of them in the open market, they could be purchased or manufactured in the navy-yard at that additional cost. Now, then, if the amendment is adopted the cost is limited either in the navy-yard or in the open market to the price at which these articles can be purchased in the open market.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Suppose that they wanted to purchase some article of equipment that the Government never manufactured. How can the Government tell that it could make it more cheaply than it could be purchased in the open market?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no provision in this bill for any article the purchase of which is authorized in this paragraph that the Government has not heretofore purchased and has not heretofore manufactured. Therefore the hypothetical case that the gentleman suggests does not exist.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Minnesota the question whether this amendment is limited to articles purchased under this appropriation or whether it be not permanent in its character?

Mr. TAWNEY. If the Chair will pardon me, I did not notice from the reading of the amendment whether the language made it permanent law or whether it was a limitation upon this appropriation. Of course if it is in the nature of permanent law it would be subject to a point of order. I inferred that it was a mere limitation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the gentleman from Michigan, I will substitute another amendment for the one that has been submitted that will meet the suggestion of the Chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended in the manufacture in any Government navy-yard of any article of a standard to be fixed by the Department by bids at the solicitation of the Department or by any other means that the Department desire which can be obtained in the free market at a less cost than the cost of manufacture in such navy-yard.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio offer this as a substitute?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did offer it as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment and substitute the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment and offer in place of it the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan will not prevail. The question of relative cost of chains and so on was gone into quite minutely in the committee, and the testimony of Admiral Manney, the head of the Bureau of Equipment, which Bureau has the making of chains and cables and so on——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts is debating the merits of the amendment.

Mr. ROBERTS. I understood that there was no point of order against this amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then the gentleman is debating the merits of the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no point of order against the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I assumed that the point of order that I made to the other amendment applied to this.

Mr. ROBERTS. I desire to speak in opposition to the amendment. If the gentleman from Michigan desires to address the committee in favor of it first, I am willing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The point of order has not been withdrawn, Mr. Chairman, to any amendment that was offered.

The CHAIRMAN. But the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But an amendment was substituted in its place, and the point of order was made against the amendment which was offered at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment substituted was a different amendment and was made without objection and submitted to the House. The Chair is of opinion that under the circumstances it did not carry with it the point of order which was made to the original amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that under the rule a Member of the House has a right to perfect his amendment before it is acted upon without unanimous consent, and if the gentleman change or attempt to perfect his amendment it is not necessary to renew the point of order every time he modifies his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The practice in the Committee of the Whole is that an amendment can not be withdrawn without unanimous consent, and when the amendment is withdrawn and a point of order is pending, that is withdrawn likewise, and a Member may withdraw an amendment for the purpose of offering another covering the same subject, but that does not keep alive the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, Mr. Chairman, this amendment was not withdrawn. The question submitted to the House was whether the gentleman would be permitted to amend his amendment by accepting a substitute. The original amendment is before the House amended by a substitute, and the meaning of the two propositions is the same.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] did not hear the language of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD], who distinctly withdrew his first amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The RECORD will show that the gentleman asked unanimous consent to substitute for his amendment the language which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] handed up to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The question submitted to the committee by the Chair was whether the gentleman from Michigan should have unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment and offer another one in its place.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That may have been the question submitted by the Chair. I did not catch that.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the one that the consent of the committee was obtained to—that proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not catch what the Chair submitted, but I either caught or thought I caught a request submitted by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD], which was not to withdraw, but to amend.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that there is no point of order pending to the amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I would now like to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] that this is an important matter which will likely take quite a lengthy time, and in view of that I think the gentleman ought to move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD remarks which I made in the House of Representatives on the post-office appropriation bill on April 12.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman would have to get consent from the House for that. The Committee of the Whole House would have no authority to grant that request.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRUMPACKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the naval appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 13783. An act to provide souvenir medallions for The Zebulon Montgomery Pike Monument Association.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, also, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 8226. An act granting an increase of pension to Laura B. Ihrie;

H. R. 10251. An act granting an increase of pension to Sarah M. E. Hinman;

H. R. 11635. An act granting an increase of pension to Jeremiah Lunsford;

H. R. 15397. An act granting an increase of pension to Edward Gillespie;

H. R. 15687. An act granting an increase of pension to William F. M. Rice;

H. R. 15907. An act granting an increase of pension to Lewis De Laittre;

H. R. 16215. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary Dagenfield;

H. R. 15435. An act to empower the Secretary of War to convey to the city of Minneapolis certain lands in exchange for other lands to be used for flowage purposes; and

H. R. 16521. An act directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and convey a certain parcel of land to Johnson County, Wyo.

ARMY SUPPLIES AT SAN FRANCISCO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I herewith transmit a letter from the Secretary of War in respect to the situation as to the Army supplies at San Francisco. This letter contains appendices showing the supplies which have been transmitted to San Francisco and their cost, and sets forth the necessity for an additional appropriation of $500,000, which I recommend be made at once. This is to meet the requirements of the immediate future.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 8, 1906.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. Foss (at 5 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 9, 1906.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. TELLER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

STATUE OF THOMAS JEFFERSON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, on behalf of the Commission created by the sundry civil appropriation act of April 28, 1904, reporting that the selection of a site in the District of Columbia for the statue of Thomas Jefferson and the procuring of plans and designs have been delayed by the death of the late Secretary of State, Mr. Hay, but that the Commission has secured the consent of Mr. Augustus St. Gaudens to make designs for the proposed statue as soon as engagements permit, and that they will be transmitted to Congress without any unavoidable delay thereafter; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRYE. I present a memorial of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to regulate the practice of osteopathy, to license osteopathic physicians, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia. I move that the memorial lie on the table, and that it be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE IN MONTANA.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5989) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River in Broadwater and Gallatin counties, Mont., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CARTER subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5989) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River in Broadwater and Gallatin counties, Mont., which was reported from the Committee on Commerce by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY].

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on Commerce were, on page 1, line 5, to strike out the words "and maintain a railroad bridge" and insert "maintain and operate a railroad bridge and approaches thereto;" and in line 8, after the word "Montana," to strike out the period and the remainder of the bill and insert:

In accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, of Montana, its successors or assigns, be, and are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River at some convenient and practicable point within the limits of Broadwater County, or between Broadwater and Gallatin counties, in the State of Montana, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF MOTOR BOATS.

Mr. FRYE. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4094) to amend section 4426 of the Revised Statutes of the United States—regulation of motor boats—to report it back favorably, and to move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 2, after "hire," insert "but not engaged in fishing as a regular business."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY LAND GRANT.

Mr. FULTON. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2292) for the relief of certain entrymen and settlers within the limits of the Northern Pacific Railway land grant.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 8, after the word "abandoned," insert:

Provided, That all lieu selections made under this act shall be confined to lands within the State where the private holdings are situated.

SEC. 2. That this act shall become effective upon an acceptance thereof by the Northern Pacific Railway Company being filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. FULTON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES L. ALLEN.

Mr. PENROSE. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13946) for the relief of Charles L. Allen, to report it favorably without amendment. I call the attention of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT] to the bill.

Mr. PLATT. I ask to have the bill put upon its passage at the present time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue to Charles L. Allen, of New York, a duplicate in lieu of United States 4 per cent registered bond of the funded loan of 1907, No. 141694, for $100, inscribed in his name, and alleged to have been lost after having been assigned in blank.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WEIGHING OF MAILS.

Mr. PENROSE. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 54) authorizing a change in the weighing of the mails in the fourth section, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That on account of the earthquake calamity in California on April 18, 1906, authority is hereby given to the Postmaster-General to use the average daily weight of mails for a period not less than thirty successive working days ascertained during the period from February 20 to April 17, 1906, in adjusting the compensation, according to law, on all railroad routes in the fourth section for the transportation of mails during the quadrennial term beginning July 1, 1906, notwithstanding the provision of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, requiring that the average daily weight shall be ascertained by the weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days not less than ninety.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM B. ASHTON.

Mr. BURKETT. By direction of the Committee on Pensions I reported back favorably the other day the bill (S. 5871) granting an increase of pension to William B. Ashton. I am informed of the death of the pensioner, and I move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DICK introduced a bill (S. 6090) to furnish bronze medals of honor to surviving soldiers who responded to President Lincoln's first call for troops; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT AGAINST POLYGAMY.

Mr. PLATT. I introduce a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I ask that it may be read, and that it lie on the table.

The joint resolution (S. R. 56) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting polygamy and polygamous cohabitation within the United States was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment be proposed to the legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall become and be a part of the Constitution of the United States, to be numbered and to read as follows, to wit:

"ARTICLE XVI.

"SEC. 1. Neither polygamy nor polygamous cohabitation shall exist in the United States or any place subject to its jurisdiction.

"SEC. 2. The practice of polygamy or polygamous cohabitation within the bounds of a State or Territory of the United States, or any place subject to its jurisdiction, shall be treated as a crime against the United States.

"SEC. 3. Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of this article by appropriate legislation, but nothing in this article shall be construed to deny to any State the exclusive power, subject to the provisions of this article, to make and enforce all laws concerning marriage and divorce within its jurisdiction or to vest in the United States any power respecting the same within any State."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO RAILROAD RATE BILL.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted four amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there are no concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 12987.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. The amendment and the amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment submitted by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] by inserting before the first word—the word "It"—in the amendment the following words:

That on and after July 1, 1911.

So that if amended the amendment will read:

That on and after July 1, 1911, it shall be unlawful for any common carrier engaged in producing, manufacturing, buying, furnishing, or selling, directly or indirectly, coal, coke, or any other commodity to engage in interstate commerce: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent a carrier from mining coal or producing other commodities exclusively for its own use.

Mr. LODGE. The pending question is on an amendment to the amendment, is it not?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. LODGE. Therefore, it is not open to further amendment at this stage. If adopted, will it be open to amendment? I think the date is altogether too remote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator proposing the amendment to the amendment can modify it, if he sees fit.

Mr. LODGE. If adopted now, it can not be amended until it reaches the Senate stage?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply wish to ask as a parliamentary matter whether a substitute would be in order for the amendment as amended after it has been amended?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that a substitute would be in order. There has been a substitute proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN].

Mr. McCUMBER. But it would not be in order at this time?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A substitute would not be in order until after the amendment has been perfected.

Mr. GALLINGER and others. Question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair the ayes have it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask for a division.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he can not modify his amendment by reducing the time somewhat?

Mr. DRYDEN. I should like to inquire what the proposed modification is?

Mr. FRYE. I should like to have it 1908 or 1909.

Mr. LODGE. 1908.

Mr. DRYDEN. I will agree to a modification making it 1909.

Mr. LODGE. That is lengthening it out too much.

Mr. DRYDEN. It gives but two years and a half to readjust interests involving hundreds of millions of dollars. I think it is a very short time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey modifies his proposed amendment to the amendment as follows.

The SECRETARY. By striking out the word "eleven" and inserting in lieu the word "nine;" so that it will read:

That on and after July 1, 1909.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BACON. I understand that the provision in the substitute is for May, 1908. Am I correct?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator inquire what is the date under the modified amendment of the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment?

Mr. BACON. That is offered as an amendment to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, is it not?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is offered as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and is not directed to the proposed substitute.

Mr. BACON. In the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia there is no time limit, I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that there is no limit in the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BACON. But there is a time limit suggested in the substitute which will be proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, which I understand to be May, 1908. So there are practically those two propositions before us.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] as modified by him to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that the amendment to the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be again read.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I should like to have the whole amendment reported as modified.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the entire amendment as it will stand if amended.

The SECRETARY. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] is to insert before the first word—the word "It"—in the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia the following words:

That on and after July 1, 1909.

So that if amended the proposition will read:

That on and after July 1, 1909, it shall be unlawful for any common carrier engaged in producing, manufacturing, buying, furnishing, or selling, directly or indirectly, coal, coke, or any other commodity to engage in interstate commerce: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent a carrier from mining coal or producing other commodities exclusively for its own use.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the yeas and nays are still desired upon the amendment to the amendment as modified.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is the question before the Senate on which we are about to vote the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, or is it upon the whole proposition?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is only upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So the subject upon which the Senate is now about to vote is the question as to whether three years or two and a half years' time shall be given for the disposition of the property.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As to whether the time mentioned in the amendment to the amendment shall be given. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. PROCTOR (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] on all votes upon the pending bill. I therefore withhold my vote, and I will make no further announcement of the pair.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SPOONER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], who is absent. I understand that he would vote against this amendment if present.

Mr. TILLMAN. He would.

Mr. SPOONER. I am therefore not at liberty to vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 29—as follows:

YEAS—44.

Aldrich	Clarke, Ark.	Gallinger	Nixon
Alger	Crane	Hale	Penrose
Allee	Cullom	Hansbrough	Perkins
Ankeny	Dick	Hemenway	Piles
Beveridge	Dillingham	Hopkins	Platt
Brandegee	Dryden	Kean	Scott
Bulkeley	Elkins	Kittredge	Smoot
Burnham	Flint	Knox	Sutherland
Carter	Foraker	Long	Warner
Clark, Mont.	Frye	McCumber	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Fulton	Nelson	Wetmore

NAYS—29.

Bacon	Dolliver	McCreary	Simmons
Bailey	Dubois	McLaurin	Stone
Berry	Foster	Martin	Taliaferro
Blackburn	Frazier	Money	Teller
Burkett	Gamble	Newlands	Tillman
Clapp	Gearin	Overman
Clay	La Follette	Pettus
Culberson	Lodge	Rayner

NOT VOTING—16.

Allison	Daniel	Latimer	Morgan
Burrows	Depew	McEnery	Patterson
Burton	Gorman	Mallory	Proctor
Carmack	Heyburn	Millard	Spooner

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I move to refer the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] as just amended by the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] and all pending amendments relating to this subject and the proposed substitute to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The reason I am constrained to make that motion is on account of the experience we have had during all day yesterday and up to this time to-day. The vote that has just been taken shows that there is a wide division of sentiment among the members of the Senate as to the wisdom of the last amendment which has been adopted. I think, however, there is no division of sentiment that this subject should be treated, and that we should have legislation which would forever divorce transportation companies from mining and marketing coal and other natural products. For one I am exceedingly anxious that this question should receive careful consideration at the hands of the committee; that a bill should be reported to the Senate; that the Senate and the House of Representatives should speedily pass it, and that it should be enacted into law; but it is too grave a question to be settled on the floor of the Senate by amendments. In my judgment it is not second in importance to the subject we are now considering, where we propose to give the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix rates. That is a marvelous advance in legislation upon this great subject.

In the coal question we meet a subject that is entirely different from the one of rates relating to railroads, but it is a subject which equally interests all sections of our common country and which equally interests all classes of people in the United States. Hence it is important that it should not be combined with this question and that it should have the careful consideration of a committee and of the Senate itself.

Senators will remember that during this session of Congress a resolution has been passed authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate this very subject; and if my motion prevails and the subject-matter of this amendment shall be sent to this committee of the Senate the committee will have the benefit of the investigation which has already been made and which is now being made by the Commission to formulate proper legislation on this great and important matter.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I make the point of order that it is not in order to move to commit an amendment to a committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. Under what rule?

Mr. BAILEY. It is in order to move to commit a bill, but there is no rule authorizing a motion to commit an amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the twenty-second rule be read.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senate can dispose of an amendment by voting it down, but there is no authority for a motion to commit an amendment to a committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the twenty-second rule may be read, and perhaps the Senator will then change his mind.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the rule, as requested by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE XXII.—Precedents of motions.

When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn.
To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain.
To take a recess.
To proceed to the consideration of executive business.
To lay on the table.
To postpone indefinitely.
To postpone to a day certain.
To commit.
To amend.
Which several motions shall have precedence as they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask the Chair to decide as to what is the pending question. What question is pending before the Senate, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. ALDRICH. It seems to me very clear, then, that the pending amendment can be committed under the twenty-second rule.

Mr. BAILEY. There is no bill pending before that committee to which this amendment would be in order. The rule clearly contemplated that the bill itself might be committed, but not an amendment to the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. The bill itself is not pending, and will not be until the question comes up on its final passage.

Mr. BAILEY. If this bill is not now pending before this Committee of the Whole, then I confess my inability to understand the situation.

Mr. ALDRICH. The bill is pending before the Senate; but the pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] as modified or sought to be amended by other Senators.

Mr. BAILEY. In a sense, Mr. President, the pending amendment is the question immediately before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems to me very clear that the clause of the rule which has been read presupposes that the bill has been reported from a committee and that it may be committed again to the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is true; and I have no kind of question in my mind that it would be entirely in order to move to commit the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BAILEY. But it is not in order to move to commit an amendment offered to the bill. The question pending in the Senate is the bill in its broad and true meaning.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. And the immediate question pending to that bill, of course, is this amendment.

Of course, Mr. President, I understand that the majority of the Senate can, on a question of this kind, make a rule to suit itself; but I do not believe in a matter of this importance that is the best way to dispose of it. If the majority think it proper to vote this down and then with their majority in committee to take it up again, or to introduce and refer a bill to the committee, it would seem that the committee could deal with it and could report. But I suggest——

Mr. McLAURIN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. How could the Committee on Interstate Commerce consider an amendment to a bill when they did not have the bill before them?

Mr. BAILEY. That is precisely the suggestion I was going to make in addition to the intimation I had given of that before. As I understand, a committee can only consider bills or resolutions referred to it. This is neither a bill nor a resolution. Probably in some cases which relate to an appropriation bill we have a rule under which amendments may be introduced to such a bill, referred to a committee, and reported, but that is under a peculiar or, at least, under a special provision of the rules.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think the point of order raised by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is undoubtedly correct. It rests upon a very fundamental proposition known to general parliamenary law, and that is that when a parliamentary body is considering a proposition an amendment to that proposition can not be considered for final disposition separately from the main proposition and can not be disposed of under any general rule of parliamentary law independently of the original bill or the main proposition.

I desire to call the attention of the Chair to one feature which grows out of that general proposition and which is recognized as a universal rule in general parliamentary law. Under general parliamentary law the motion to lay an amendment upon the table can not be received and adopted without carrying the main proposition with it, and that is based upon the general proposition which I have just suggested, that to adopt a motion to lay an amendment upon the table would recognize the propriety of the disposition of an amendment in a manner independently of the disposition of the original proposition. Therefore it is that it is only when there is a special rule, such as we have in the Senate, which varies the general proposition that to that extent an amendment can be disposed of otherwise than by a direct vote either adopting or rejecting it.

It is manifest, Mr. President, that that general rule is a proper one, and for myself I have always regretted that we have a rule in the Senate which permits an amendment to be laid on the table independently of the original proposition. The purpose of laying a matter on the table is to temporarily pass from its consideration with the expectation thereafter of returning to its consideration, a purpose which manifestly can not be carried out in the case of an amendment, because when you lay an amendment on the table and pass on to other matters it is impracticable thereafter to return to its consideration. Therefore it is that the purpose under our rules of laying an amendment on the table is not the general purpose which is sought to be subserved in the laying of any matter on the table, but it is for the purpose of its permanent disposition, which is a perversion of the original purpose of the motion. That is so treated here, so that when an amendment is laid on the table it is permanently disposed of. The only difference between that and any other proceeding in reference to an amendment is that it allows the Senate to come to a vote without further debate upon it.

I only mention that for the purpose of illustrating the general proposition that an amendment to a proposition can not be disposed of by being referred to an independent body, or by any other disposition in any other manner than either by its adoption or its rejection, unless there is a special rule which authorizes it, as we have in the special rule of the Senate under which it can be laid upon the table.

Mr. President, the general proposition which I submit to the Chair as a sound one, and which I think can not be safely assailed, is that in the case of an amendment to a substantive proposition there is no way in which that amendment can be disposed of independently of the original proposition except by its rejection or its adoption, unless there is a specific rule which authorizes a different disposition, as is the case in our rules where a motion to lay upon the table is permitted.

I say, Mr. President, that is a fundamental proposition, and Senators may search the books and they may search the commentators on parliamentary law, and they will find no exception to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will pardon me, a motion to commit or to recommit a bill would carry with it all amendments.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, unless he desires to ask me a question——

Mr. ALDRICH. I was going to ask a question.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will pardon me for a moment.

Mr. President, the intimate connection between an amendment and the original proposition is not only illustrated by the general rule, as I have endeavored to state it, but it is further illustrated by the practice which is recognized in all parliamentary jurisdictions that a motion to dispose of amendments in any other way, as by a motion to lay it on the table, will carry with it in the same direction the original proposition. There are two ways in which the question of a motion to indirectly dispose of an amendment can be treated. One is to say it is out of order, as is practiced in some jurisdictions, and not to consider it; and the other is to say that it is in order, as, in fact, the regular rule; but if it prevails it carries with it the original proposition. In other words, the nexus between the two is so intimate that parliamentary law does not recognize the possibility of their severance, and one must go with the other. It is the unborn child which can have no life when sundered from the mother.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, the Senate, as well as the House of Representatives, is acting under a code of rules that has been adopted for its guidance. Such rules are paramount to any general parliamentary law or even to Jefferson's Manual, which was originally adopted by the Senate.

Under the rules of the House of Representatives this proposed amendment of the Senator from West Virginia would be ruled out of order, because under the rules of the House an amendment that is proposed to a pending bill must be germane. The bill that is pending here before the Senate is a bill that relates to the regulation of the rates of railroads—a subject that is entirely separate and distinct from the question that is raised by the amendment that was originally offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

I do not care, Mr. President, whether you call that amendment a question or an amendment. The name does not make the difference. It is a separate and distinct question from the proposition that is presented here in the bill that was reported by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If it is a separate question, the fact that the Senator from West Virginia calls it an amendment can not change the rules of the Senate. What is the rule of the Senate on that matter? It says:

> When a question is pending no motion shall be received but * * * a motion to commit.

The question that is pending before us under the amendments covered by the motion I have made is nothing that relates to the fixing of rates or any question that is incident to the completion and perfection of the bill upon that subject; but, as I have observed, it is something separate and distinct and of such grave importance that the members of the Senate have been kept here for two days without being able to reach any conclusion whatever upon the subject. It seems to me that, with the rule before us, it is just as reasonable and as pertinent to adopt the motion here as it is to take the construction of the Senator from Texas. If this motion is adopted, we are simply giving a reasonable and pertinent construction to the rule itself. According to the argument of the Senator from Texas, he must give a construction to the rule in order to have his conclusions adopted, and the language is as open to the construction for which I contend as it is for that of the Senator from Texas. In view of the paramount importance of the question, it seems to me that the construction that this is a new question and that the committee can take jurisdiction of it under this motion should prevail.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am as anxious as anybody could possibly be to have this subject, which I think a large and complicated one, referred to a committee, so that before the conclusion of the session we may act upon it intelligently and better than we possibly can now; but I can not vote, Mr. President, to attain that result, which is easily attainable in an orderly manner and in conformity with what I believe to be parliamentary law, in a manner which I believe to be contrary to parliamentary law and contrary to the practice of the Senate.

An amendment has no existence except in connection with the measure to which it is proposed. When we send amendments to a committee to consider it is because the bill to which they are proposed is in a committee in a state of preparation; but this bill is before the Senate; it is not before the committee; and there is no bill before the committee relating to this subject. If there were a bill before the committee relating to this matter—the divorcing of railroads from the ownership of coal lands—it would be then perfectly proper to refer these amendments for the consideration of the committee in connection with that bill. But to take the amendment away from the bill by which alone it can have parliamentary existence, I do not believe can possibly be done.

I have looked as well as a very brief time would permit me to do so at the very full collection of precedents of the House which were prepared for the House, and there is not a suggestion in all the innumerable questions that have arisen about amendments and committal that a motion to commit could ever be applied to an amendment by itself. A motion to commit invariably applies—and every decision in this great work shows that it applies—to the bill, to the subject before the House, and not to an amendment to the subject or the proposition before the House. The first words of the eighteenth chapter on amendments are:

> Under the rule relating to amendments the following motions are in order: To amend; to amend that amendment; for a substitute; and to amend the substitute.

These are all the motions that are in order in regard to an amendment.

Our standing rule simply establishes the order of motions. It does not say what we can commit. Those are the motions, in their order, which may apply to the proposition before the Senate, or, like a motion to adjourn, apply only to the action of the body and not to the proposition then pending.

Mr. SPOONER. The motion to commit must apply to the substantive proposition.

Mr. LODGE. The motion to commit, the Senator from Wisconsin suggests, must apply to some substantive proposition. The substantive proposition before the Senate is the bill, and nothing else. The amendment is a mere attachment proposed to the bill, which may come into existence, or may have no existence; but it is here only because the bill is here. If there was no bill here, nobody would suggest that an amendment could be discussed when no bill existed to which it could apply.

Mr. President, I can find nothing in the general parliamentary law that refers to anything but the committal of the subject before the body. There is an utter absence of any suggestion, in any volume of rules at which I have been able to look, that it was ever contemplated that an amendment by itself could be committed to a committee or referred separtely from the main proposition.

I want to see this whole subject committed to a committee, with the understanding that it shall be reported on in proper form and dealt with before this session adjourns; but I think it ought to be done in an orderly way, and in conformity with the universal practice of the Senate and with the general principles of parliamentary law. If we want to commit these amendments to a committee, we have nothing to do but to introduce a resolution or a bill covering this subject, and then refer all the amendments as relating to that bill; but to refer amendments alone I do not think can possibly be done.

Mr. ALDRICH. The weakness of the contention of the Senator from Massachusetts is disclosed upon its statement. He says that if a bill were offered in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce having reference to this subject, then these amendments could be taken out of the Senate and referred to that committee.

Mr. LODGE. An amendment to a bill pending in the committee could be referred, of course, to the committee. That is our practice.

Mr. ALDRICH. It seems to me that the Senator in conceding that gives away his whole case.

Mr. LODGE. Not the least in the world. There is no bill in the committee to refer the amendments to. You can not have amendments without a bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is not necessary to have any subject before the Committee on Interstate Commerce to refer another subject to that committee, I take it.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will excuse me, it is not a subject; it is an amendment you are proposing.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is an amendment but a subject, and what is an amendment but a motion, and what is an amendment but a question? If anybody can distinguish between a motion and an amendment and a question, as treated by parliamentary law, I should be very glad to have somebody discuss that point.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. On page 115 of Jefferson's Manual it is said:

1. It would be absurd to postpone the previous question, commitment, or amendment, alone, and thus separate the appendage from its principal; yet it must be postponed separately from its original, if at all; because the eighth rule of Senate says that when a main question is before the House—

The main question here is the bill to regulate commerce—

no motion shall be received but to commit, amend, or prequestion the original question, which is the parliamentary doctrine also.

Mr. ALDRICH. Those are questions pertaining to the original question, which is the bill itself, but I am discussing this question from the standpoint of the twenty-second rule, which says that any question pending—which in this case is simply an amendment—can be committed, and that a motion to commit is in order.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] claims that because the Senate has provided in its rules that an amendment can be laid upon the table without carrying the main question, therefore, that is a reason why this motion can not be made.

Mr. BACON. The Senator entirely misunderstands me.

Mr. ALDRICH. By inference that is what the Senator said.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no; that is not the reasoning at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then I did not understand the Senator and I could not understand him. Of course the reason why a motion to lay on the table is made——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to state it? He says he did not understand it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I was simply using that by way of illustration——

Mr. ALDRICH. That is what I understood.

Mr. BACON. Pardon me a moment—by way of illustration showing that that particular thing itself could not be done, it being made an exception by special rule of the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. Why?

Mr. BACON. And that, in the absence of a special rule of the Senate, no such disposition under general parliamentary law could be made of an amendment. Under general parliamentary law a motion to lay an amendment on the table is practically not in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. BACON. I am not.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator is mistaken about it.

Mr. BACON. Pardon me a moment. I stated to the Senate that——

Mr. ALDRICH. I will yield to a question, but I do not care about the Senator's enunciation of general parliamentary law. It would take too long, and he can do that in his own time.

Mr. BACON. I do not desire to do it in my own time. The Senator said he did not understand me. Of course, if he does not wish to allow me to go on, I will not obtrude.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator merely wanted to ask a question. The Senator says that under general parliamentary law a motion to lay an amendment upon the table is not in order. The Senator is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. BACON. I started to say to the Senator——

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will certainly permit me to set myself correct.

Mr. ALDRICH. Very well.

Mr. BACON. I said distinctly, when I was on the floor before, that there were two modes of procedure. One practice was to rule it out of order altogether, and the other was, in other parliamentary schools, to hold it to be in order, but that it carried the original proposition with it if it prevailed. I distinctly stated that before.

Mr. ALDRICH. I never heard of any parliamentary school that said a motion to lay an amendment upon the table was not in order. There is no such parliamentary school.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not now.

There is a general rule—I might say a universal rule—of parliamentary law that when an amendment is laid upon the table it carries the main question with it; and it was necessary, in order that the action could be otherwise here, that a special rule should be adopted for that purpose. That is all there is of that question.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is mistaken in saying that that is all there is of it, from the fact that there are parliamentary schools and practices in which the opposite is done, where simply, instead of ruling that it carries the original proposition with it, they adopt the device of saying it is not in order at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. I know of no such school.

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will present some papers or documents or statements or books here that will carry out that idea, I shall be very glad to see them; but I never heard that question raised before.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not just now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island declines to yield.

Mr. ALDRICH. It seems to me perfectly plain that this is a substantive proposition, which has to be disposed of in some way. It can be disposed of by being laid upon the table, it can be disposed of by postponement, it can be disposed of by committal, not only under the rules of the Senate, but under ordinary parliamentary law.

The Senator from Massachusetts says he has looked through the books, and the Senator from Georgia has said that there is nothing of the kind in the books. They must have overlooked the question itself, because the parliamentary law as understood in the Senate is Jefferson's Manual, which was made years ago the authority of the Senate upon all questions of parliamentary law not included within the Senate rules. I call attention to page 106, where it is said in terms:

A particular clause of a bill may be committed without the whole bill.

Mr. LODGE. But not an amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. If we can commit a clause, we certainly can commit an amendment or a proposed clause. The only difference is that one is a clause and the other is a proposed clause. In the wide search of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Georgia they seem to have overlooked that.

Mr. LODGE. I read it yesterday when I was looking up this question, but it has no bearing upon it whatever.

Mr. ALDRICH. It has every bearing.

Mr. LODGE. Nobody denies that you can commit a bill or a part of a bill. But that is not an amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. If you can commit a clause of the bill, you certainly can commit an amendment, by inference; at least it seems to me so.

I am only anxious for this question to be decided. So far, up to this time, at least, there has been no rule or precedent of parliamentary law cited by either of the Senators against the proposition as laid down by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I simply rose to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question. On page 4, commencing at line 18, the bill reads:

Any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act receiving freight in the United States, etc.

If I should move to amend by inserting after the words "United States" the words "except freight from the Republic of Cuba or the Philippine Islands," I will ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether he thinks he could move to commit that either to the Committee on Interstate Commerce or the Committee on Relations with Cuba?

Mr. ALDRICH. My contention is that the Senate, by a majority vote, can commit any pending question, whether it is great or small, to a committee of this body.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have only this to say: I am so clear that the contention of the Senator from Rhode Island is wrong that if I have an opportunity I shall vote against it. I think the point of order made by the Senator from Texas is absolutely sound, both under our own rules and general parliamentary law; and, while I am just as anxious as any Senator possibly can be to have this matter disposed of as speedily as possible, I shall not, for the purpose of expediting the work of the Senate even on so important a bill as this, vote to violate what I think is clearly both the rule of this body and of general parliamentary law.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am just as anxious as is the Senator from New Hampshire that this question shall be decided properly. I have no feeling about whichever way it may be decided. I should like to ask the Senator whether, in his judgment, the first section of this bill could be recommitted to the Committee on Interstate Commerce without the remaining portion of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, under Jefferson's Manual; and that is the only authority I have discovered. I believe Jefferson's Manual is a portion of our rules, although it is not very often observed or referred to, and if it were referred to and observed it would cut off a good deal of debate in the Senate. I think

I will in the future call attention to two or three provisions in Jefferson's Manual which, if observed, will expedite our business.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then the Senator does think the Senate can refer a particular clause——

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, of the original bill, under Jefferson's Manual. That is the English rule. But it is rarely ever enforced or observed.

Mr. ALDRICH. Suppose we adopt this amendment. Then it could be immediately taken from the bill and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no idea that the Senate would do that.

Mr. LODGE. Not until it has passed all its stages.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. The interjection of the Senator from Massachusetts renders this matter even more absurd, because if it can not be done until it has passed all its stages, then it can not be done, because the rules of the Senate and general parliamentary law——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply want to add a word. The Senator from Rhode Island declined even to allow me a question. I hope he will not take all my time. I am not going to occupy much time in this debate. I think ten minutes will cover all the time I have occupied.

I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island that under Jefferson's Manual the first section of the bill could be referred to the committee if the Senate in its wisdom concluded to do so, but I have not any idea that the Senate ever would do that. It is an English system which we have never invoked in our legislation, so far as I know. There may have been isolated cases——

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me one further question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia should be adopted and become a part of the bill, could we recommit it?

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not the bill; but this clause.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under Jefferson's Manual we could recommit section 1, I think, but that rule has never been invoked in this body during the fifteen years of my membership, and I do not think the Senate would think it was a wise procedure.

Mr. President, I simply wish to say a word. If we can commit the pending amendment, we can commit any amendment that may be offered to this bill, and it would be an absurd procedure for this body or any body to commit amendments to a committee when the proposition itself was not before that committee. I do not believe the Senate is going to sustain a contention of that kind.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I wish to say just one word in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island as to what is meant by the clause which he finds on page 106. Anyone who has any familiarity with the construction of opinions rendered by courts will readily recall the fact that you can take an isolated sentence and prove almost anything unless you examine the context or unless you look to the particular subject-matter under consideration at the time of the decision. All courts recognize that in the construction either of statutes or of judicial opinions those matters have to be looked into in order to arrive at the correct meaning.

I have no doubt that the rule as laid down on page 106 is a correct rule so far as it is applicable, and it is a very easy matter to give an illustration which will show how that rule may be construed broadly and still be very limited in its application. Suppose we had no general Appropriations Committee and that the appropriations which relate to all of the various Departments of the Government were in a single bill, in which provision was made for the Army, and provision for the Navy, and also provision for the Post-Office Department. When it came before the Senate it would be perfectly in order, under such a rule as that, to distribute the part of the appropriation bill which related to the Army to the Committee on Military Affairs, the part of the bill which related to the Navy to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the part of the bill which related to the Post-Office Department to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. That is an entirely simple matter, and it is matters of that kind which are contemplated by this rule which he cites from page 106. The Senator can not find, and I issue the challenge broadly to him, in any reputable work any authority for the proposition that when a substantive proposition—a concrete proposition—is before a body and an amendment is offered to that proposition it is in order for the body to proceed with the consideration of the original proposition and send the amendment to the consideration of a committee.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I thought the Senator from Georgia was through.

Mr. BACON. I am through.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Go ahead.

Mr. ALDRICH. It seems to me he is laying down a proposition here for which he ought to furnish some authority. I will say that he can not find in the whole range of parliamentary law or the whole range of parliamentary precedents any rule or precedent which will sustain his contention.

Mr. BACON. It is very hard to find rules which prove a negative.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, this question was settled yesterday when the Senate voted upon the proposition whether a motion to lay on the table was in order. They held that it was in order. I did not vote that way and thought that the conclusion of the Senate was erroneous. But the majority was overwhelming, and of course it is decisive. What was that? The whole question here is whether or not an amendment is a question. The rule reads:

> When a question is pending no motion shall be received but—
> Among others—
> To lay on the table.
> * * * * * * *
> To commit.

Yesterday the Senate decided, by a vote of 49 to 29, that an amendment is a question for the purpose of moving to lay it on the table within this rule. If yesterday an amendment was a question for the purpose of moving to lay it on the table within this rule, why is it not to-day a question for the purpose of moving to commit it under the rule? Unless the decision of the Senate yesterday, which I then thought and still think was wrong and revolutionary, was wrong and revolutionary, the action of the Senate yesterday by an overwhelming majority must conclude the Senate to-day. Yesterday when the question was whether the motion to lay on the table was in order, I voted "nay," and I still maintain that view; but I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Georgia why, if an amendment on yesterday was a question within this rule for the purpose of moving to lay it on the table, it is not to-day a question for the purpose of moving to commit it?

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator wants me to answer I will.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it has any bearing on the question we are discussing.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course that is a very lucid answer. I trust it is conclusive to the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. LODGE. I very much hope the Senator from Indiana understood it. I tried to make it lucid.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I trust it is conclusive to the Senator if not to anybody else. He can not solve this question or convert anyone by mere impatience.

Rule XXII reads:

> When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—
>
> To do what?
> To lay on the table.

To lay what on the table? To lay the question on the table. What was it the Senate agreed that it was in order to lay on the table yesterday? The question. What was the question? This particular amendment. The rule simply says that when a question is pending a motion to commit is in order. To commit what? The question? What is the question? The amendment which yesterday we held that it was in order to move to lay on the table. So, if the action of the Senate yesterday was correct, the motion to commit must necessarily be in order now.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] is mistaken when he says the only thing we have to determine is whether this is a question, and I think he is mistaken in the reading of Rule XXII. The rule reads:

> When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—
> To adjourn, etc.

It does not say that when a question is pending it shall be in order to move to adjourn, to commit, etc. But—

No motion shall be received but—
To adjourn.
To adjourn to a day certain. * * *
To take a recess, etc.

Now, this must be construed reasonably. It never was intended that the rule should require the doing of an idle thing, and it never was supposed that the Senate would so construe the rule. It may be there are clauses in bills which can with propriety be separately committed to a committee; but when it speaks of a motion to commit, it must be a motion to commit a question that is referable, not a question that is not referable, not a question that may not be committed without doing an idle thing.

If an amendment to a bill or to a section of a bill is committed to a committee, it must carry with it the bill, unless the commitment is supposed to do an idle thing. For how could the committee consider an amendment to the bill without having the bill before the committee? Suppose these amendments were committed by this motion to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and suppose that the committee starts out to consider the amendments. How is the committee going to give any intelligent consideration to the amendments without the bill being before the committee to consider in connection with the amendments and to consider how the amendments would affect the bill or would affect the sections they are intended to amend? It would be an idle ceremony to commit these amendments to the committee without the bill for their consideration, because when you got them into the committee there would be no amendment to anything so far as the committee is concerned. It would not be an amendment to the bill, because the committee would not have the bill to consider. The committee would have no amendment to any bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator agree that the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia involves an entirely distinct and separate proposition from anything contained in the bill?

Mr. McLAURIN. It does not.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, it certainly does.

Mr. McLAURIN. It is an amendment to the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is an amendment to the bill technically, but it involves the consideration of a new proposition entirely; absolutely distinct and separate from anything that is now in the bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. Will the Senator let me ask him a question? How is the committee to know that without having the bill before it?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think they would know it by reading the proposition itself.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think it is to be presumed that they would know it intuitively.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think, unless they are lacking in intelligence, they would understand that.

Mr. McLAURIN. They would know it was an entirely different proposition from anything——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator think that this amendment, which involves the question of preventing railroads from indulging in mining coal, or transporting it, as their own, is a question? Does the Senator think the amendment states a question to the Senate?

Mr. McLAURIN. It states a question, but not a question that is referable without the bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to follow that question by another one. If it does state a question, and that question is, under the rule, such a one as anyone may move to lay on the table, why is it not also a question, under the rule which names them both, which anyone may move to commit?

Mr. McLAURIN. Whenever a question is before the Senate that can be committed, it must be a question which it would be reasonable to commit; it must be a referable question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McLAURIN. Yes; if the Senator will let me finish answering his question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; I will.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think a motion to lay an amendment on the table is permissible, so far as that is concerned——

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me for a moment?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. If precedent has anything to do with it, I suggest to the Senator that he will find a thousand precedents where amendments have been laid on the table; and he can not, I think, find one where an amendment was ever committed to a committee by the Senate.

Mr. McLAURIN. That is a complete answer to the Senator's question.

Mr. BERRY. It is universal to table amendments—at least, it has been the practice for the last twenty years; but I do not think the Senator from Rhode Island can find a single precedent where an amendment has ever been committed to a committee without the bill being committed also.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. One sentence is sufficient. We yesterday established a precedent which brings this within the rule. I ask the Senator whether it is a question of discretion, under the interpretation put upon this rule by the Senate, by an overwhelming vote, when the rule says "when a question is pending no motion shall be received but," and then names exceptions, thus permitting those motions to be made, and among those exceptions are "to lay on the table" and "to commit?" Those two motions are in order. To commit what? A question. Is not an amendment a question? Yesterday the Senate decided it was, for that purpose.

Mr. McLAURIN. The Senator asked permission to ask me a question. I hope he will not make a speech in my time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yesterday the Senate decided that it was a question for the purpose of making one of the motions named in the rule. Why is it not to-day also a question for making another motion named in the rule?

Mr. McLAURIN. I have tried to answer the Senator. The Senator made a mistake in the reading of this originally, but now comes back to the correct reading. This does not presuppose that all of these motions may be made under any circumstances, or that any one of these motions may be made under all circumstances. But "when a question is pending, no motion shall be received but," etc.; that is, if the amendment itself is pertinent and permissible, then it may be made when the question is pending. It does not follow, simply because when they are pertinent and when they are logical and when they are permissible, they may be made, that, therefore, under all circumstances, or under any circumstances, they may be made. It would be an idle thing, it would be an absurd thing—I do not say it offensively, but it seems to me it would be an absurd thing—to refer an amendment to a committee without referring the bill, or to refer an amendment to a section without referring the section.

Now, I put it to any Senator, how could a committee consider an amendment to a bill without having the bill before it for consideration? Can it be done? If it can not be done, then would it not be an idle thing to undertake to compel the committee to consider an amendment—and that is what it means when it is referred to the committee—to the bill without the committee having the bill before it so that it could see what application the amendment had to the bill?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not want to take all of the Senator's time. In the Senate it is competent to offer any kind of an amendment. It is not as it is in the House, where the amendment must be germane.

Mr. McLAURIN. I understand that an amendment ought to be germane, or it is not permissible.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; I will ask my question. Suppose some Senator was to propose an amendment upon an absolutely different subject, something which had to do with our foreign affairs or something of that kind. It would be proper to offer such an amendment in the Senate, within the discretion of any Senator. But it would involve a subject which had nothing whatever to do with the pending bill. Does the Senator mean to say that the Senate could not refer that amendment to a committee without committing the bill with which it had nothing to do?

Mr. McLAURIN. I mean to say that I do not admit the premises of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will refer to the rules, he will observe that an amendment of that nature would be submitted by the Chair to the Senate for determination as to whether it is germane. We have a specific rule on that point.

Mr. McLAURIN. That is correct, and it is a complete answer to the Senator from Indiana. I do not admit his premises.

Mr. President, I rose merely to say a few words in reference to the reasonableness or idleness of referring an amendment without the bill, and the impossibility of the consideration of the amendment by the committee without the bill, and to say that if there is any disposition to kill the amendment, the best way to do it is to vote it down. It can be voted down, if Senators desire to do so, and it can be gotten rid of in a direct way without doing a thing which would be utterly idle and a thing which it would be impossible for the committee to do.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to make clear what perhaps I did not make clear when I first addressed the Senate on this point. Under our rules, or under our practice, at least, an amendment to a bill pending before a committee can be referred to that committee for consideration during the pendency of the bill in the committee. If this bill were before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, we could refer an amendment to that committee to consider it in connection with the bill. It is a voluntary proceeding, and proceeds usually by unanimous consent, or the introducer may ask to have the amendment lie on the table. If a bill relating to the subject was now before the Interstate Commerce Committee, we could refer amendments to it on request in the usual way.

My point, and my sole point, here is that the bill to which is offered this amendment, which it is now proposed to refer, is here in the Senate, and no amendment can be detached and sent off into the air where no bill exists. The amendment draws its whole vitality from the bill, the main proposition, to which it is offered.

Now, under the old rules of the Senate a motion to lay on the table was always in order, but so closely were bill and amendment united that it was of no value in shortening debate on amendments, because it was held that the motion to lay on the table, applied to an amendment, carried the bill with it; and we owe it to the Senator from Maine that we read in our rules to-day—

Any amendment to a general appropriation bill may be laid on the table without prejudice to the bill.

And, again—

When an amendment proposed to any pending measure is laid on the table, it shall not carry with it or prejudice such measure.

Now, that, and that alone, is what has made the motion to lay an amendment on the table effective in shortening debate, because under the old rule the motion to lay the amendment on the table carried the entire subject with it, the amendment was so wholly a part of the bill before the Senate.

Mr. President, in reference to the suggestion of laying a question on the table, I will say we are not laying a question on the table. We are laying an amendment on the table, or we are laying the bill on the table. There are questions which come before the Senate, like the motion to adjourn or the motion to take a recess to a time certain, which are not open to the motion to commit. This rule of precedence of motions has nothing whatever to do with the question that is before us here, and that question is simply this: Can you commit to a committee an amendment to a bill when the bill is not before the committee, but is here in the Senate? Can you detach an amendment and send it to a committee? Would it be suggested that any Senator, under our practice, could introduce an amendment—not to any bill, just an amendment—and send it to committee? Of course, it has to have a bill in order to exist.

Mr. ALDRICH. I remember very many times in the history of the Senate when amendments have been offered to a bill which could be sent to another committee than the one from which the bill came or to a committee without any reference to the bill itself. For instance, I remember that on the Army appropriation bill the so-called "Platt amendment" was offered in reference to affairs in Cuba, involving a code of laws practically for the government of the Republic of Cuba. Does any Senator say that that could not have been sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. TELLER. It was not, was it?

Mr. ALDRICH. It was not; but it was considered by unanimous consent because of the overwhelming necessity for action. I think neither the Senator from Colorado nor any other Senator would contend that it would not have been in order to move to refer that amendment to the Committee on Foreign Relations or the Committee on Cuban Relations.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We can not hear the Senator's interesting remarks here.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have known of a great many other cases where bills that were not in any sense germane to a pending bill were offered as amendments.

Mr. TELLER. And adopted?

Mr. ALDRICH. Sometimes adopted and sometimes otherwise.

Mr. TELLER. Did the Senator ever know of an isolated amendment being sent alone to a committee? If he did, I wish he would tell us when it was done.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think this is a question of power and not a question of precedent.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, I wish to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question. Suppose a committee——

Mr. LODGE. I wish the Senator from Texas, who is going to direct a question to the Senator from Rhode Island, would let me finisn first what I have to say.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I will direct my question to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. Suppose a committee having in charge a bill were to report to the Senate an amendment, plainly that would not be in order; and so it seems to me neither would it be in order for the Senate to send to the committee having no bill an amendment to it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has just called my attention to a passage in Jefferson's Manual which I did not notice yesterday, and which occurs at a point where I had not looked, but which seems to me to indicate the principle which we have been discussing.

Mr. BURROWS. On what page?

Mr. LODGE. On page 115:

Suppose a motion for the previous question——

Mr. ALDRICH. That has already been read by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read again. It was not heard.

Mr. LODGE (reading)— or commitment, or amendment of the main question, and that it be then moved to postpone the motion for the previous question, or for commitment or amendment of the main question—

I did not hear the Senator from Georgia read it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Texas read it

Mr. BACON. It was the Senator from Texas.

Mr. LODGE (reading)—

it would be absurd to postpone the previous question—

Which of course we do not have here—commitment, or amendment alone, and thus separate the appendage from its principal.

That is the whole point in this question. The amendment is an appendage. The point is not to lay a question on the table; it is to lay an amendment or a bill or a motion on the table. Here the point is to commit an amendment separately from the bill, and that is the only point involved.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is an appendage.

Mr. LODGE. I have been utterly unable to find that the matter has even had enough standing in any parliamentary body to have ever been considered.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I wish to make merely one suggestion. While the Senate is considering this matter in Committee of the Whole the Senate must report to the Senate, and the Senate in Committee of the Whole can not refer this or any other matter to another committee. I find on page 107 of the Manual a statement that—

A committee, even of the whole, can not refer any matter to another committee.

That probably refers to the rule of the House; but it would seem to me a rather anomalous procedure for a Committee of the Whole to take action referring a given subject to a committee of the Senate instead of to the Senate itself.

Mr. ALDRICH. But, Mr. President, the Committee of the Whole, as the words Committee of the Whole are used there, have no reference to the Committee of the Whole in the Senate, but to the Committee of the Whole in the House. The purpose, I assume, of the Senator from Illinois in making the motion was that we might be brought to some conclusion upon this question. It looks to me as though we are liable to have more discussion on the preliminary question than perhaps on the main question.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I would like to make one further suggestion. If by Rule XXII, "when a question is pending, no motion shall be received but," it is intended to say that all these motions may be made in reference to the question, could a motion be made to commit a motion to take a recess, or to commit a motion to lay on the table, or to commit a motion to postpone indefinitely, or to commit a motion to adjourn?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas raises a point of order against the motion of the Senator from Illinois to the effect that the motion is not in order under the rules of the Senate. The Chair finds no sanction for the motion in the well-recognized practice and usage of the Senate. The Chair will, therefore, leave the question to the determination of the Senate itself, as it is entirely within its competency to decide whether the motion is in order or not.

Mr. LODGE. On that question let us have a roll call.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. All who are of opinion that the motion of the Senator from Illinois is in order—no, those who are of opinion that the point of order of the Senator from Texas is well taken will vote "aye," and those opposed "no." Upon this proposition the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BERRY. How is the proposition to be put?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the point of order of the Senator from Texas well taken?

Mr. ALDRICH. I would suggest that it is the usual practice to submit to the Senate the question whether the motion is in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It can be put in either form. It may be better understood if it is put as the Chair first suggested, Is the motion of the Senator from Illinois in order?

Mr. HALE. Yes; that is better.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Those who are of opinion that the motion is in order will vote "yea" as their names are called, and those opposed "nay." The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll; and the result was—yeas 25, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—25.

Aldrich	Dick	Hopkins	Sutherland
Ankeny	Dolliver	Knox	Warner
Beveridge	Dryden	McCumber	Warren
Carter	Flint	Millard	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Foraker	Nelson
Crane	Fulton	Nixon
Cullom	Hansbrough	Piles

NAYS—48.

Allee	Clay	Kean	Overman
Bacon	Culberson	Kittredge	Perkins
Bailey	Daniel	La Follette	Pettus
Berry	Dubois	Latimer	Platt
Brandegee	Elkins	Lodge	Rayner

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Upon the question as to whether the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] is in order the yeas are 25 and the nays 48. The Senate decides that the motion is not in order. Do the friends of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] desire to make further amendment thereto? [A pause.] The question recurs on the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN].

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. President, if I am at liberty to modify it——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has such privilege.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I will ask that the amendment be withdrawn and that what I send to the desk be substituted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi as modified.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] insert:

From and after May 1, 1908, it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to transport from any State, Territory, or District of the United States to any other State, Territory, or District of the United States or to any foreign country any article or commodity manufactured, mined, or produced by it or under its authority, or which it may own in whole or in part, or in which it may have any interest, direct or indirect, except such articles or commodities as may be necessary or used in the conduct of its business as a common carrier.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves to lay the amendment just read on the table.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator withhold that motion for just a minute? I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this amendment is a great improvement on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia. That amendment provides that—

It shall be unlawful for any common carrier engaged in producing, manufacturing, buying, furnishing, or selling, directly or indirectly, coal, coke, or any other commodity to engage in interstate commerce.

In other words, it provides that the carrier engaged in this business shall not engage in interstate commerce. That is a very serious matter to the public.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that unless the Senator from Maine withholds his motion debate is not in order.

Mr. CLAY. I understood the Senator to yield.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator withhold his motion just two minutes? It will not take me two minutes.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it is very apparent to me that we shall make no progress unless we dispose of these amendments.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island will state his question of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to inquire whether an amendment to an amendment can be laid on the table without carrying the amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that it can. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine to lay the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] to the amendment on the table.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I wish to submit a point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will state his point of order.

Mr. BACON. My point of order is that, while the motion to lay upon the table may be in order under certain circumstances, it is not in order as long as any Senator desires to speak upon this subject. I will state the reason.

Mr. ALDRICH. I made another point of order, and——

Mr. BACON. I have not stated the point yet. My point of order is that we are not proceeding under the general rules of the Senate, but we are proceeding under a special-consent agreement, and in the absence of that special consent there will be nothing in order with reference to amendments except to debate them. Any authority for voting upon an amendment now is found in the consent order and in that alone. Otherwise an amendment would not be in order to be voted on until the bill came up for final disposition. Being a part of the consent order, all of the consent order must be taken, which provides that it is to be disposed of after debate, fifteen minutes to each Senator. That is the consent order, and the order is absolutely nullified if this ruling is sustained.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the Senate construed the unanimous-consent agreement yesterday.

Mr. BACON. Will the Chair permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Chair that yesterday there was no question as to whether any Senator desired to speak.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senate decided yesterday that a motion to lay an amendment on the table was in order under the unanimous-consent agreement; and the Chair construes the motion to lay on the table as a nondebatable question under the well-recognized rules of the Senate. Therefore the Chair will not entertain debate if the Senator from Maine insists upon his motion.

Mr. HALE. I do insist upon it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. I rise to a point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island will state his point of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is not possible to lay an amendment to an amendment on the table without laying the entire amendment on the table.

Mr. BAILEY. It will save all that trouble if the Senator from Maine will withhold his motion and let the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] withdraw his substitute. We will then vote directly on the Elkins amendment and save all trouble.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Before doing that I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Should the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia be voted down, will the amendment that I have offered then be in order if it should be withdrawn now?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Any amendment would be in order as an independent proposition if the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia should be voted down.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Then, to save the point of order of the Senator from Rhode Island, I withdraw the amendment and will allow a vote to be taken on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HALE. Then I withdraw the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine withdraws his motion and the Senator from Mississippi withdraws his amendment.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I rise——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Let the Chair state the parliamentary status of the question before the Senate. The junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] withdraws his amendment in the nature of a substitute to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has withdrawn his motion to lay the same on the table.

Mr. MONEY. I wish to ask a parliamentary question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The senior Senator from Mississippi will state his parliamentary question.

Mr. MONEY. I understood a moment ago—I will be corrected by the Chair if mistaken—that the Chair stated that the action of the Senate yesterday was that when a motion was made to table an amendment that motion was in order under the general-consent agreement. I wish to ask this question of the Chair: If that is true, will there be any debate at all on any amendment if any Senator chooses to make a motion to table? And how can the consent to debate this question be enforced if any Senator can rise in his place and move to table an amendment when it is presented? It certainly cuts off all debate. The intention of this general consent, it must be admitted by every Senator here, was to have an agreement for a fair debate on this question and all amendments pending and that may be offered. The motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] was, in my opinion, clearly out of order; otherwise it closes debate on this whole question.

Mr. HALE. I have just withdrawn the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine has withdrawn the motion.

Mr. MONEY. I was asking for information of the Chair, if the rule as he stated it was correct, what becomes, then, of the power of debate? What was the object of the unanimous-consent agreement?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the unanimous-consent agreement apparently arrested the regular rule of the Senate with respect to moving to lay amendments upon the table, and that the construction put upon the unanimous-consent agreement by the Senate yesterday does not change the ordinary rule.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I understand that the Senate yesterday determined that a motion to lay on the table is in order after discussion. I do not understand that it went any further. I do not understand that the Senate has determined that now a motion to lay on the table may be in order the moment an amendment is offered.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I think the Senate yesterday, simply as suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], decided that the question of determining when debate should close was with the Senate; and that is all that there was of it. The vote on the motion to lay on the table shows that the question was determined without reference to the particular amendment then pending. It was simply reserving to the Senate the right, after proper debate—which, of course, the Senate must determine—to lay on the table. If any Senator moves to lay an amendment on the table before the discussion has taken place or before the Senate thinks a sufficient amount of discussion has taken place, it is certainly within the power of the Senate to refuse to lay it on the table. I think it could be safely left to the Senate to determine those questions.

Mr. President, this rule has been in force in the Senate ever since I have been a member of it, and I have never known it to be abused. I recall no instance where a motion has been made when any Senator appealed to the Senator making it to withhold it that he might make some remarks and he was not allowed to proceed, except, perhaps, in one or two cases some years ago, where, for particular reasons apparent to everybody in the Senate, it was desired that the Senator who was proposing to make remarks should be taken off the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] as modified by the adoption of the amendment to it proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN].

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] will reoffer his substitute. If he does not, I will; because it seems to me that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi is a very carefully prepared and conservative proposition.

Mr. CLAY. The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi is certainly a great improvement on the pending amendment; and I do not see how it can be improved.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I introduced a substitute yesterday for the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, and I want to know the position of that substitute. It was placed before the Senate by the Chair and discussion was started on it. Now that the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi has been withdrawn, I desire to offer the substitute which I offered yesterday and on which debate was partially had.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that if he will look carefully at this amendment he will be quite willing to accept it in place of his own.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I think he will accept the one I proposed, and it is much shorter. I simply wish to know whether it can be offered now as a substitute?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is in order unless the Senator from Rhode Island has offered the one that was withdrawn by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I should like to know, then, what became of the one offered yesterday and which was partially under discussion?

Mr. GALLINGER. It was read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. MCCUMBER. No.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not hear the Senator from Rhode Island distinctly as to whether he proposes to offer the amendment withdrawn by the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not formally offer it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then the substitute proposed by the Senator from North Dakota is in order.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I should like to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

From and after July 1, 1908, any common carrier under the provisions of this act is prohibited from engaging in marketing or selling any coal, coke, or other commodity entering into interstate commerce.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, that is a very simple proposition, and I would ask any Senator to challenge its covering the whole subject in a very few words. It does not deal with commerce wholly within a State. It simply prohibits any common carrier, after a given time, July 1, 1908, not from engaging in interstate commerce, but from dealing in coal, coke, and other articles of commerce in interstate commerce, not from dealing within the State, but from dealing in interstate commerce.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator from North Dakota believe that Congress could prohibit a railroad company from selling within a State commodities which it produces in that State?

Mr. MCCUMBER. No; and that is the object of my amendment. The amendment as drafted by the Senator from West Virginia penalizes the company itself if it should attempt to do that. This amendment does not attempt to do that. I will say to the Senator from Texas that I do not consider that Congress has power to say to a corporation that it can not do wholly within a State what the State laws authorize it to do, and that it can prescribe a penalty against its doing those things. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator, I think, is entirely right in saying that Congress can not prohibit a corporation from doing within a State a lawful act. But the trouble with the Senator's amendment is he describes it as an article that enters into interstate commerce. Almost every article enters at some time into interstate commerce.

Mr. MCCUMBER. No.

Mr. BAILEY. But the article itself may be carried from one State to another, and after being carried, it may be sold within the State. The description is not accurate.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I beg pardon of the Senator. The only thing the company is prohibited from selling is the article owned by itself which enters into interstate commerce. Before it enters into interstate commerce it can sell it under the laws of the State; but it can not the moment that it enters into interstate commerce, and it can not enter into interstate commerce until it has changed from one State to another or has been loaded for the purpose of going from one State to another. So the prohibition is simply against the selling of the article which it must ship from one State to another or to a foreign country; in other words, the article which must go into interstate commerce before it can be sold, because that is the limit of our authority.

We can not reach the company buying and selling in the State in which it is lawful to buy and sell, and I think if the Senator will read that very short amendment again he will find that it clearly expresses that.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, is it not clear enough from the Senator's amendment——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it not clear that the language of the Senator's amendment is broad enough to prohibit the carrier from selling his commodity in the State?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not under the amendment which I offered.

Mr. SPOONER. I think it is.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think not.

Mr. SPOONER. The amendment reads:

Any common carrier, under the provisions of this act, is prohibited from engaging in marketing or selling any coal, coke, or other commodity entering into interstate commerce.

Mr. McCUMBER. What commodity? The commodity which it sells entering into interstate commerce—not like articles.

Mr. SPOONER. Suppose a corporation—a transportation company engaged in interstate commerce, if you please—under the authority of the laws of a State engages in mining coal; under the Senator's amendment may it not sell that coal in the State, to be put into the channels of interstate commerce by the purchaser, who may not be a transportation carrier at all?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly not.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Senator, if he will carefully read the amendment, will see that I am right.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will hand me the amendment, I will read it again.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from North Dakota does not deal with the question whether the carrier which produces the commodity shall be permitted to put it into interstate commerce or not; he deals with the power to sell the article if it is to enter into interstate commerce, which is clearly beyond the power of Congress.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let us see what the amendment means upon a fair and simple construction.

Any common carrier under the provisions of this act is prohibited from engaging in marketing or selling any coal, coke, or other commodity—

What kind of coal or coke or other commodity and how marketed? That coal or coke or other commodity which enters into interstate commerce?

Mr. SPOONER. Suppose a corporation is engaged in interstate commerce as a carrier and is also lawfully engaged in mining coal in the State of Pennsylvania, for instance, and it sells that coal in the State of Pennsylvania, and the purchaser of that coal in the State of Pennsylvania consigns it to New York over a line not owned or operated by the carrier which produced it?

Mr. McCUMBER. This provision would not in the slightest degree touch that. Therefore it is not the person then selling it, the man who purchases within the State; he can, of course, ship it into any other State. It is not the carrier, therefore, that is shipping it; it is a private individual or whomsoever he sells it to. The common carrier, under the provisions of this bill, is simply prohibited from selling those articles which will enter into interstate commerce before they can be sold or disposed of in another State.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I propose to modify the amendment which I offered by offering what I send to the desk as a substitute for it.

Mr. ALDRICH (to Mr. ELKINS). Modify the amendment.

Mr. ELKINS. Well, I will modify the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia proposes to modify his amendment. The proposed modification will be read.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment as proposed to be modified be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment as proposed to be modified will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

From and after May 1, 1908, it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to transport from any State, Territory, or district of the United States to any other State, Territory, or district of the United States, or to any foreign country, any article or commodity manufactured, mined, or produced by it or under its authority, or which it may own in whole or in part or in which it may have any interest, direct or indirect, except such articles or commodities as may be necessary or used in the conduct of its business as a common carrier.

Mr. GALLINGER (to Mr. ELKINS). Make the date 1909.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say in reference to that amendment, that if it be adopted, I should have no objection to it, and I am perfectly willing that it shall take precedence over the substitute I have offered.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to ask if there is any substitute pending in the Senate at this time? If there is not, I desire to offer one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a substitute offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. McCUMBER. I will withdraw my substitute temporarily for the purpose of allowing the substitute offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to be acted upon.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, if the Senator withdraws his substitute I should like to know it, because I desire to offer one.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia be again read.

Mr. CULBERSON. I offer what I send to the desk as a substitute for the pending amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the proposed substitute is read—I have suggested to the Senator from West Virginia that this morning by a very large majority the Senate voted that the date should be 1909, and I trust the Senator will modify his amendment accordingly.

Mr. ELKINS. I will accept that.

The SECRETARY. The proposed substitute is modified so as to read:

From and after May 1, 1909, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? If not——

Mr. BAILEY. I want to say to the Senator from West Virginia that if he agrees to over two years in which these gentlemen may readjust themselves, he will get no vote for his proposition on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. ELKINS. Then I am willing to make it 1908.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I desire to state that the substitute which I have offered——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Texas please suspend until the proposed modification of the Senator from West Virginia is disposed of?

Mr. CULBERSON. No, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Until it is perfected.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from West Virginia has modified his amendment, and it is now before the Senate. I offer a substitute for it, which is in order, as I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the modification proposed to be made by the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HOPKINS. I object until I can have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from West Virginia has a right to modify it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the Senator from West Virginia would have that right up to the time of the adoption of an amendment to his amendment or the ordering of the yeas and nays. An amendment was agreed to this morning——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota will state his point of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. The point of order is that the substitute offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is not in order until the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia has been disposed of.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator, I wish to say that the Senator from West Virginia did not offer an amendment, but he modified his original amendment.

Mr. ELKINS. That is right.

Mr. BERRY. Now, it is the pending amendment as modified, and the Senator has a right to modify his amendment at any time before it is amended or the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to that amendment would be in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I understand——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. One moment, if the Senator please. The Chair will inquire whether the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] modified his amendment in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN]?

Mr. ELKINS. No. This is modifying the original amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, can we not have the amendment as it now stands read?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair referred not to the recent proposed modification. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] proposed an amendment, and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] proposed an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Was that amendment acted upon?

Mr. ELKINS. I think not.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia can ask unanimous consent to modify his amendment, notwithstanding the amendment. Of course the rule is as the Chair states it, that after an amendment has been made to an amendment a Senator can not, except by unanimous consent, withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BERRY. Has the original amendment been amended?

Mr. FRYE. It has been amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The modification can now be made only by unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the amendment that was inserted in the amendment has the date "1909," and now the Senator from West Virginia proposes to modify the amendment by making it "1908."

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from West Virginia took that back.

Mr. ELKINS. I withdrew it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not think the Senator withdrew that. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN], after making a very convincing speech, as I thought, offered an amendment making the date 1909. That was adopted by a very large vote of the Senate, and the Senator from West Virginia can not modify his amendment so as to change that date. He can not possibly do it, except by unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The rule says that amendments may be withdrawn or modified at any time before an amendment has been adopted or the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. But this has been amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the present proposed modification can only be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. Let the Chair ask that consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. HOPKINS. I said that I should object until I had an opportunity to thoroughly examine the amendment. I may approve it after examination, but I do not propose to give my consent until I know the full effect of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. McCUMBER. Referring again to my point of order, is not the motion of the Senator from West Virginia to amend his original amendment the question now before the Senate?

Mr. CULBERSON. I submit that the Chair has properly declared that to be out of order, and of course it is not pending.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from West Virginia offers to modify the amendment and that is not accepted. Then is not that the question before the Senate?

Mr. ELKINS. I can offer it now, Mr. President, and I do so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia proposes to amend his original proposition——

Mr. ELKINS. To modify it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that that is not in order.

Mr. ELKINS. Does the Chair decide that that is not in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that it is not in order.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senate desires to do so, it can promptly vote down the amendment which is pending, which was offered by the Senator from West Virginia; and it being voted down, the Senator from West Virginia then can offer such an amendment as he pleases.

Mr. ALDRICH. He can offer an amendment in his own right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that that would be in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I desire to ask, in view of the present situation, if a substitute for the pending amendment of the Senator from West Virginia is in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. Then I offer the one I have sent to the desk as a substitute. Mr. President, before the substitute is read, I desire to say that it is based upon——

Mr. ALDRICH. I have been trying to get the attention of the Chair, but I do not seem to have succeeded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was about to ask the Chair if the Senator from West Virginia can not move to amend his own amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has decided that the Senator from West Virginia might move to perfect his amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. He had better offer it, then, as an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has a proposed substitute. Does the Chair understand him to withdraw it?

Mr. McCUMBER. I withdrew it simply for the purpose of allowing the Senator from West Virginia, if he could, to offer what I understood was an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would understand that the withdrawal is an absolute and final withdrawal, so far as the present parliamentary situation of the question is concerned.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, before——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] proposes an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], which will be stated.

Mr. ELKINS. I will then offer it in accordance with the ruling of the Chair to perfect the amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Before the Senator from West Virginia——

Mr. CULBERSON. I submit that the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Rhode Island can not take me off the floor when I am offering an amendment.

Mr. ELKINS. There is no disposition to do so. What is the substitute proposed by the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CULBERSON. It will be read in a moment, if you will only be quiet.

Mr. President, the chief evil which we desire to eradicate in this matter is the ownership of coal mines by railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce. A great many Senators believe that an absolute prohibition against the ownership, production, and manufacture of coal by such corporations can not be legitimately made by the Congress of the United States. Without going into that question—and as to its general effect I agree—the question before the Senate is, How, if at all, we may reach that evil without undertaking to prohibit such ownership and production absolutely? That is the point—not to prohibit these companies from carrying coal from one State to another necessarily, because that will not reach the evil. The evil is the ownership and the production by the corporations themselves aside from their legitimate business of transportation.

I grant that there are two or three sentences in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio case which indicate that, in the unanimous opinion of that court, the very fact of the ownership of coal which may pass into interstate commerce by transportation over the lines of the owner of the coal is in itself a violation of the regulations provided by Congress in the interstate-commerce act. Let me read those two or three sentences:

> And the considerations previously stated serve also to demonstrate that the prohibitions of the act to regulate commerce concerning "undue or unreasonable preference or advantage," "undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage," and "unjust discrimination" are in conflict with the asserted right of a carrier to become a dealer in commodities which it transports, and as such dealer to sell at a price less than the cost and the published rates.

Indicating, Mr. President, as I have already suggested, that, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, it is at least a serious question whether the ownership and production by a company engaged in transportation is not in itself a violation of the interstate-commerce act and the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

Going back to the case of the Addyston Pipe and Steel Company against the United States, which is reported in 175 U. S., I invite the attention of the Senate to the decision of that court to the effect that such an evil as that may be reached when the companies engage in the production and manufacture for the purpose of transporting it from the State of the manufacture and production and entering, therefore, into interstate commerce. I want to read a sentence or two from that opinion.

Mr. CLAY. From what page does the Senator read?

Mr. CULBERSON. I read from the Addyston Pipe case (175 U. S., pp. 170–240):

> The direct and immediate result of the combination was therefore necessarily a restraint upon interstate commerce in respect of articles manufactured by any of the parties to it to be transported beyond the State in which they were made.

The amendment or substitute which I propose, Mr. President, is based upon this decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and I ask now that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] it is proposed to insert the following:

> It shall be unlawful for any corporation, association, or joint stock company engaged as a common carrier in foreign or interstate commerce to engage directly or indirectly through its officers, agents, representatives, employees, directors, or corporations organized for the purpose or otherwise in the production, manufacture, buying, furnishing, or selling of coal, coke, or other commodity of commerce to be transported by it beyond the State or Territory where such coal, coke, or other commodity of commerce is produced, manufactured, bought, or the possession thereof is obtained by said corporation, association, or joint stock company. Any violation of this provision shall be deemed a misdemeanor and the corporation, association, or joint stock company found guilty thereof shall be fined $500 per day for each day it shall unlawfully engage in the production, manufacture, buying, furnishing, or selling as aforesaid: Provided, That when any coal, coke, or other commodity of commerce which is produced, manufactured, bought, furnished, or sold by such corporation, association, or joint stock company is transported by it beyond the State or Territory where it is produced, manufactured, bought, furnished, or sold it shall be conclusively presumed that it was produced, manufactured, bought, furnished, or sold for such transportation: Provided further, That this provision shall not be construed to prohibit such corporation, association, or joint stock company from mining fuel exclusively for its own use: Provided further, That this provision shall take effect from and after July 1, 1908.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, as I can not vote for that amendment, I think it fair to myself to state my reason for voting against it. The same reason which would have compelled me to vote against the amendment originally proposed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] will compel me to vote against this one, because this, like the other, undertakes to prohibit what Congress has no power to prohibit, and thus introduces a question which can be and ought to be avoided.

That Congress can prohibit a corporation engaged in certain enterprises from engaging in interstate commerce, I do not think subject to a reasonable doubt; but if, under its jurisdiction to regulate interstate commerce, it can enter the States and forbid the manufacture, production, or sale of commodities, then, sir, the power of the Federal Government is greater than our fathers ever dreamed. The Federal Government can say that a State corporation can not, while engaged in certain industries under the law of the State, extend its operations to other States; but if in assuming jurisdiction over interstate commerce the Federal Government can enter into a State and there control the processes of production, the enterprise of merchants, and the business of the farmer, simply because they are producing something that may enter into interstate commerce, then, indeed, the commerce power of the Federal Government destroys all of the reserved powers of the States.

I have not had the time to examine the Addyston Pipe case, but my recollection is that in that case several manufacturers of certain commodities agreed among themselves upon a division of territory; in other words, one manufacturer was to sell in one group of States, another manufacturer to sell in another, and still a third manufacturer in a third group. My recollection further is that the Supreme Court held that an agreement of that kind was contrary to the antitrust law of the United States. That the Supreme Court could well hold that all gentlemen on this side will readily agree; but the basis of that decision, extending the power of the Government over a contract of that kind, was that it was to be executed in the various States and therefore constituted an unlawful restraint of interstate commerce. I am not sure that I recall the facts in that case, but if I do—and I think I do—the case itself affords no warrant for saying that because an article is manufactured for sale through interstate commerce the Federal Government possesses a power over that article before it becomes the subject of interstate commerce. As I recall the old case of Coe v. Erroll, certain logs had been cut in the State of New Hampshire for transportation to the State of Maine, and yet the court held that those logs did not become the subject of interstate commerce when they first came from the lumber camp to the depot, but that they only passed under the jurisdiction and control of the Federal Government in its regulation of interstate commerce when they reached the depot to begin their journey to their point of destination in another State.

So they held in the Knight case that it was not sufficient that the sugar trust was manufacturing sugar to become afterwards the subject of interstate commerce, and that the Federal Government's control over the sugar manufactured by the sugar trust only attached when the sugar itself became the subject of interstate commerce.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that we incur a great risk if we put the power of the Federal Government to deal with this question upon the doctrine that it may prohibit what the States may permit, instead of resting it upon the acknowledged power of the Federal Government to determine who shall engage in commerce among the States and what articles can be the subject of interstate commerce. If we put it upon that authority we incur no risk, whereas if we put it upon the other, in my judgment the Supreme Court of the United States will hold that Congress has exceeded its constitutional authority.

For that reason I can not myself vote for any amendment that assumes a power in the Federal Government to control those who may engage in the business of manufacturing, producing, or selling commodities entirely within a State of this Union. It seems to me, even if I am wrong about that, nobody doubts that it is safer to put it on the other ground. Will we not accomplish the same purpose by putting it on the undisputed and indisputable ground?

I prefer myself the original amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, when properly worded in that respect, because it is the broadest, and annihilates either the common carrier's participation in interstate commerce or compels it to desist from the business which does not belong properly to a common carrier. My own opinion is, however, that an amendment as broad as that proposed by the Senator from West Virginia can not pass this body, and that the utmost we can hope for is the amendment prepared by the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Georgia and now proposed by the Senator from West Virginia as his substitute. It is almost in the very line of the amendment hastily offered by the Senator from Virginia on the day before yesterday. While it seems to represent as nearly as possible what can be done, I frankly say it does not go as far as I want to go, and I prefer the broadest and most absolute prohibition that can be drawn; but I want it drawn in a way which I think will enable it to stand scrutiny in the courts. The connection between production and transportation can be destroyed without destroying the reserved rights of the States.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, on a former occasion I expressed grave doubt as to the propriety of engaging in departures from the main purpose of the pending bill. The shippers of this country have demanded in and out of season that the power to fix a rate should be vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission. The purpose of the pending bill is to vest that power in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

In connection with the laudable effort in that direction, responsive to a well-defined and long-continued public demand, we encounter Senators possessed of a variety of views with reference to the proper method of curing other evils incident to interstate commerce and even State commerce. I think it has been clearly demonstrated upon this floor within the last forty-eight hours that this subject, contemplating the restriction of interstate-commerce railroads or common carriers to their legitimate business, constitutes quite as prolific a subject of discussion as the principal question covered by the bill itself.

The proposed amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] has led to a protracted debate and to numerous amendments and substitutes, and we now have the two distinguished lawyers from Texas taking direct issue with each other upon this floor, not only as to the details of a proposed substitute, but as to the constitutionality of the manner in which it is proposed to deal with the question.

This body, representing all the States, is happily constructed for the purpose of furnishing illustrations instructive on an occasion of this kind, and I rose merely to show from a practical condition existing in the State of Montana how utterly mischievous this amendment would be if adopted. The amendment proposes to prohibit any common carrier from engaging in interstate commerce if such carrier is directly or indirectly engaged in the production, manufacture, buying, furnishing, or selling of coal or coke or any other commodity or commodities of commerce.

Let me cite the case. We have one enterprise in the State of Montana in which there are to-day over 20,000 men engaged at good wages in the production of copper. It constitutes the great industrial enterprise of our State. This copper is reduced 20 miles from the mines. The mines are chiefly in and about the city of Butte. The largest copper smelter in the world is located at Anaconda, some twenty-odd miles distant. For many years the great mining companies undertook to have their ores transported from Butte to Anaconda through the agency of an independent railroad company.

They found the rolling stock inadequate; the cars were not suited to the purpose; the service was fitful and uncertain, and rates were often prohibitive.

In order that this work might proceed, the copper companies on their own account built a railroad from the copper mines to the copper smelter, a distance of 20 miles. In actual operation this intervening piece of track between the mine and the smelter is as essential to the operation of the general business as the tracks within the levels themselves, upon which run the small cars filled with ore.

This railroad, running from Butte to Anaconda, was constructed principally to carry the copper ore from the mine to the smelter. Incidentally passengers are carried over it also. The Great Northern uses that track for 20 miles, because Anaconda is the terminal of the Great Northern passenger trains which reach there from St. Paul and Puget Sound. It is therefore partly engaged in interstate commerce. The supplies shipped in to the citizens of Anaconda are billed from Philadelphia, New York, and Chicago over this road to Anaconda, and whatsoever the body of the people have to ship out from the town of Anaconda must be shipped over this road, and billed to distant points in the country. The coal needed to run the smelter at Anaconda is shipped from Wyoming very largely, and to a considerable extent the coke is shipped from British Columbia, and to a considerable degree from Connellsville, in the State of Pennsylvania.

Therefore this line of road, only 20 miles in length, primarily constructed to haul ore, splendidly equipped, with a magnificent roadbed, 90-pound steel rails, ponderous locomotives, equipment unexcelled in any part of the country for a road of like length, is engaged in interstate commerce.

Now, what would be the effect of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia? This company would be compelled to dismember itself. The effect would be to disrupt and disorganize and devitalize the best and largest industry and enterprise in that State. The enterprise can not be successfully conducted without the railroad, and the railroad can not be operated successfully by an outside company. That I say because I speak from the experience which compelled this company to invest millions upon millions of money in providing this intermediate transportation system between the smelter and the mines.

Now, I objected on a former occasion to the use of the very general term "or other commodities." I am amazed at the inability of Senators to draw amendments intended to cure evils. Failing to comprehend the exact disease, in the midst of a period of excitement in the Senate, they throw in the words "or other commodities," so that everything in creation may be included, regardless of consequences. Go to the great Northwest where iron ore is mined in large quantities, where the tracks of a railroad are shifted about from time to time in such manner that no railroad company would go in there to operate, and the mine must own the means of transportation or quit the business. And yet, Mr. President, this amendment would so far dismember the enterprise that we would bring about idleness where busy men are now engaged. We would drive capital out of employment and drive men into idleness and destitution.

Let this subject-matter, clear and distinct, in and of itself a subject to be treated, be taken up by the Interstate Commerce Committee, carefully considered and finally reported. The chief purpose of the amendment is to cure an evil which has become well known to the country at large—the control of coal by the railroads in the anthracite region in Pennsylvania. That is the main purpose of the amendment. Of course the evil extends to West Virginia and contiguous territory. But therein rests the point to which most of the discussion is directed, and that is the evil sought to be corrected. It will require the best thought of the Interstate Commerce Committee to apply a general law to that existing evil and at the same time avoid touching a vital point in the industrial life of the country in many other sections.

I shall vote against every amendment relating to this subject, not because I have little sympathy with those who seek to escape from the evils in Pennsylvania, but because I do not wish to be a party to enacting a law which, while curing an evil at one point, will produce infinitely greater evils at other points.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, there is an inherent incompatibility in the engagement by a common carrier on its own account in business other than that which the public have authorized it to engage in for public purposes. It is not in order that a carrier may make money by selling commodities that the people accord to them rights to condemn their lands. There are an abundance of people who are ready to engage in commerce who can not be given for such purposes the right to take the property of others against their will. The practice has grown up, however, in some States of so intermingling private business with public concerns that large capital has been invested in some corporations which run a competitive line against their own customers, to the great disparagement and disadvantage of all small traders and of small business men. When, however, we are dealing with an evil which has grown and in which many perfectly honest and correct interests have been commingled, we are dealing with a subject somewhat like the confusion of goods, and we should seek not to spoil the goods in extricating and in refining the rights of the parties.

For that reason the Senate has been impressed with the views set forth by the Senator from New Jersey, and has responded thereto in a reasonable degree.

Mr. President, until 1909, as it would seem to me, is a little longer than necessary. Two years is full time for all the new dispensations to take place in an orderly and in a patient way, without distracting and upsetting the business of the country which is being conducted on present plans. Therefore, I have taken the amendment which I offered day before yesterday and inserted as a prefix the words:

That it shall be unlawful after the 1st day of July, 1908, for a carrier engaged in interstate commerce to carry its own articles in traffic.

If the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] shall be voted down, I shall then offer this amendment, with a few verbal changes, in lieu of the then pending amendment which would be before the Senate.

Let me say as to the amendment of the senior Senator from Texas, I share the opinions of his colleague, the junior Senator from Texas, on that subject. I believe it would be exceedingly unwise to mingle one clear and beneficial thought with another, as to which there may be question, not that I do not share also fully the sentiments of both the senior and the junior Senator from Texas, that we ought to obviate this evil just as rapidly and just as thoroughly as the Constitution and laws of the United States will permit.

I object to the amendment as it has been offered by the senior Senator from Texas simply upon the ground which ought, in my opinion, to be decisive against it, whatever may be the merits of its separate parts, that it intermingles and confuses the clear line of thought which is in the amendment the Senator from West Virginia will offer or has prepared to offer if his pending amendment shall be reached in such way that he can do so.

I regret to see, Mr. President, such a persistent effort made in this body to sidetrack the greatest single question with respect to interstate commerce which has come before it. I say the greatest single question, for there is no other proposition in the bill now pending which is of greater dignity and of greater weight commercially, legally, or in any other wise than is the one now pending.

While I appreciate fully, too, the cautions which were given to us by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], I would remind that Senator that he was himself the Senator who brought before this body, in letters and in petitions, the great evil that is being done by carriers, which refuse cars to private citizens and to business men who are dependent upon these public agencies, and which employ their own cars in their own personal business for their own profit and behoof. And while I would be cautious and prudent with respect to all chartered companies that have been authorized by legislatures to mingle private and public business together, I would move with as firm and intrepid a step to correct the evil as a fair and conscionable and equitable regard to the interests of all would permit.

I regret to see, Mr. President, so much time taken up in the Senate in seeking most extraordinary and astonishing moves to sidetrack and get in committee or anywhere else but here a leading and most important proposition which is essential to the utility of this bill. I hope that the Senator from West Virginia, if I shall have the opportunity to offer it, will accept the substitute which I shall submit if the amendment of the Senator from Texas shall be voted down. Let me suggest to the Senator from Texas, who has more than one idea in his amendment, that as a prudent and wise legislator and a most learned lawyer, as I know him to be, he take one idea at a time. If this idea shall be ingrafted upon this bill it does not stand in the way of his drawing another amendment which will put his own separate ideas in clear and distinct shape. But when he has so commingled them he concentrates against a single proposition thus compounded those who may oppose either of them, and only weakens the cause by the doubt which may be honestly entertained in one mind or another as to one proposition or another.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion of the measure now before this body. I have followed the discussions from day to day, but have never heretofore participated in them, as they related chiefly to questions of a legal character, concerning which I preferred to listen and to learn. I am prepared, when we get to the point, to support a reasonable rate bill, and I am confident that a conclusion will be reached in the near future that will be fairly satisfactory to all the people.

I am as much in favor of the regulation and restriction of the railroads of the country in all of their efforts to deal unfairly with the people as any Senator in this Chamber. I am particularly in favor of the prevention of rebates and discriminations against individuals, companies, and localities, which are the principal evils complained of, and I will go as far as any other member of the Senate to adopt a penal provision for the punishment of such offenses.

We have now reached the consideration of some practical questions involved in this great discussion, and I feel it my duty to myself and to my constituents and to the great West, which I in part represent in this Chamber, to submit some observations upon the pending amendment.

As I understand it, the suggestion of this amendment was an investigation demanded by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] concerning the operations of railroads in West Virginia.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CLARK of Montana. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I will correct him in that particular. The investigation now being made by the Interstate Commerce Commission deals with the general subject of coal monopoly and of the merger or pooling of railroads in dealing with coal. But this particular issue of divorcing coal production and transportation grew out of the petitions sent in from the Red Rock Fuel Company and a half dozen or more other private operators in Pennsylvania and in West Virginia. I have possibly twenty more up at my committee room, which I did not present. I put in ten or twelve here—one every morning.

But the exposition of the iniquity and the outrage of this system of squeezing out private citizens and corporations and having the roads monopolize the production and the transportation and the marketing of coal resulted from these memorials and not from the investigation which is going on. When we get the facts which that investigation will doubtless give us, the cry for relief will be so loud and strong that the Senate can not put it off; and I do not say that the Senate is now desiring to put it off, although some Senators, realizing the difficulties, appear to want to postpone action. I myself would be glad to have immediate action, if it takes us a month to discuss and so limit it that we will not do any section or any interest harm while giving protection and relief to those interests which are now being squeezed to death.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. I stated, Mr. President, that I believe the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] grew out of the complaints that were sent from West Virginia. So far as I know, there have been no complaints from any other part of the country.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I have just had a complaint——

Mr. CLARK of Montana. As my time is limited, I will ask the Senator to wait until I get through.

Mr. TILLMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. So far as that locality is concerned, and possibly in other localities in the eastern coal regions, there are grievances which are properly complained of and which should be dealt with promptly in some other manner, but, in my judgment, such legislation does not properly belong in this rate bill. The difficulties referred to are local in their character, and legislation of a general character like the proposed bill would not be applicable where the conditions are entirely different, as I will endeavor to show.

I am fully in accord with my colleague [Mr. CARTER] as to what he stated concerning the operations of great mining companies in the State of Montana. I wish to say, further, there was not a transcontinental railroad constructed across this continent that was not obliged to open up coal mines for its own use, and not only for its use, but for the use of the people settling along the lines of these roads to build up homes and open farms and mines. I know it was so in Montana, and in Montana to-day three-fourths of the coal consumed in that State and in the city in which I live, having a population of some 80,000 people, where several thousand tons of coal are burned each day in the various mining and smelting enterprises and for domestic purposes, is supplied by the railroad companies. Were it not for the railroads that have made it possible to open up mines all through that western country, supplying fuel not only for domestic, but industrial purposes, those great industries could not have reached the marvelous stage of development which we find there.

The Northern Pacific Railway Company were obliged to go into coal mining for their own protection, and they are to-day employing in the State of Montana 3,000 coal miners and have built up a large town at Red Lodge, in the eastern part of the State. The Great Northern Railroad Company likewise opened coal mines in northern Montana. These roads were not only obliged to do this to meet their own requirements, but they, and the Oregon Short Line operating from the south, were called upon to furnish at least three-fourths of all the coal consumed in the State. There were times there when, notwithstanding the greatest efforts of those companies to supply the people with coal, owing to a congestion of business, there were coal famines in all the towns of Montana; and what would have been the condition of the people of that State had it not been for the railroads owning and mining and shipping supplies of coal to meet their requirements?

I wish to say, further, that in no instance in my experience of over thirty years in Butte, no matter how scarce that commodity has been, have they ever raised the price of coal to the consumer. The railroads have been an essential factor in the development of the western country which we should not overlook in our desire to protect a few shippers in West Virginia.

There is another feature of this question which I want to present to the Senate. All over that western part of this continent, as has been shown by the development of a half century, discoveries of great mines have been made and are still being made everywhere. In many instances mines are found containing base metals, lead and copper, at points many miles away from any railroad. Persons who own those mines of base metals can not work them unless they have railroad facilities. Butte was kept back for fifteen years for want of railroad facilities, and I know of a number of instances where mines have been discovered and developed and found to be big mines, but being owned by individuals or perhaps by a single company there was no railroad company that would undertake to build a line to them for the reason that it would be hazardous, as they might shut down the mines at any time. What was the result? The owners of the mines—the individuals or the company, as the case might be—have been obliged to build a branch road themselves to the nearest road, in order to secure access to the markets of the world for the products of their mines.

There is an instance of this kind in southern Arizona. The Copper Queen Mining Company is owned by Phelps, Dodge & Co., and they have a number of the greatest mines in that wonderful Territory. They were obliged for their own protection to build a road about 200 miles in length, and to-day it is in operation. When that road was constructed it became a common carrier, subject to the rules and regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Now, what are you going to do under this amendment with such a proposition as that? I myself was obliged to build a road shorter than that—but 28 miles in length—before I could get the products of a copper mine to the market. When I completed that road, some fifteen years ago, it became an interstate-commerce road, because all the products went out and supplies came in through other States and Territories.

By this provision how am I to proceed? I am between the devil and the deep sea. I will either have to stop the operations of the mine or the railroad.

There are a number of other instances of this same character all over the mighty West. I should like to know, as I inquired before, what disposition are you going to make of such enterprises? Are you going to throttle them on account of some imaginary or actual grievance against roads elsewhere? I say "imaginary," because a good deal of it is imaginary, although there are localities where evils do exist. Wherever a railroad company, owning its own coal mines, undertakes to mine coal and ship it out in competition with other coal-mine operators and refuses to furnish them ample facilities for transportation of their products to the markets, I would be in favor of legislation as strict and radical as anyone here to prevent grievances of that kind. But I believe, Mr. President, that the consideration of this question should be had separate and apart from the great proposition with which we are now dealing. Let us endeavor to establish interstate commerce with such restrictions and prohibitions as will result in fair and equitable treatment in protection of the interests of both shipper and carrier, but in doing this we should not incur the risk of destroying or crippling legitimate enterprises. Therefore, as I said before, I am in every respect in sympathy with and in favor of stringent legislation, but I shall oppose every amendment of this character which, in my opinion, will work a great injustice to a great number of people and result in harm to some of the great enterprises throughout the western country.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I presume we may safely say that every railroad in the United States is engaged in interstate commerce. In dealing with this question we are dealing with practically the entire railroad system of the United States. I made some remarks yesterday on this proposition, but in a different form, on the amendment which was then pending—the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia. This is somewhat a different proposition. I was then impressed, and I am still impressed, with the fact that it is exceedingly difficult to deal with this question here and now and that it is a question which ought to have been dealt with by a committee. But I am somewhat loath to admit that the Senate, after a discussion of a few days, can not pass some reasonable and satisfactory bill touching that evil which is most conspicuous in connection with the transportation particularly of coal.

The case decided by the Supreme Court in February last was decided under the existing law, and it would appear from an examination of that case that there is ample law to deal with this subject. What I want to call the attention of the Senate to is simply that the complaint there was with reference to the transportation of coal. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] who has introduced this subject is making his complaint simply because of the unfair treatment of the coal miners and coal dealers of that State. The Senator from Montana who first spoke [Mr. CARTER] has told us something of the difficulty of dealing with this question, and so has the Senator from Montana [Mr. CLARK] who spoke last. With some knowledge of the condition not only in Montana, but in Arizona, what both Senators have presented here satisfies me that there is danger of this legislation going very much beyond the point we ought to go. We are very liable to do more harm than good. If we could confine it entirely to the coal business for the time being, I think perhaps it would be better than to include all commodities and all kinds of service.

I have no hesitation in saying that I am a firm believer that those who do transportation business should do nothing else. But, as I said yesterday, I wish to repeat, it is a matter which is not absolutely under our control. The States charter these companies and create these corporations and they declare what their powers shall be. When the product of a mine, in the case of coal, passes into interstate transportation it becomes subject to our control. It is absolutely without control on our part unless we assume a control that we never have assumed until it does reach that stage. Practically one may say that all the coal product of Pennsylvania enters into the interstate commerce of the country. New York and all New England and all the West are supplied with the anthracite coal mined in Pennsylvania. Anthracite coal reaches even as far west as the Missouri River. It was in the earlier days sent clear into the State of Colorado. Just now we are mining sufficient anthracite coal in Colorado. Of the 76,000,000 tons of anthracite coal mined in Pennsylvania last year the great majority of it went outside of the State. It is all of it the subject of interstate commerce. Yet there are corporations in Pennsylvania which are authorized by the law of Pennsylvania to mine coal and to transport it. It is not an illegal act; it is not a crime; it is not an offense against the law either moral or legal.

I do not know but Senators may think it is easy to deal with these subjects. For myself, Mr. President, I find it exceedingly difficult to determine just what would be legal and then what at the same time would be just. Perhaps, under the circumstances, we have made such an exhibition of the conditions and of the offenses of some of the railroad companies that we ought to do something, if possible, toward completing this legislation on the pending bill; but I am still of the opinion that it would have been better if we had dropped this subject in the beginning and remitted the whole subject to the committee of the Senate authorized to deal with it.

Mr. President, taking the case that I spoke of, the case of the Chesapeake Coal Company, which the court decided in February last, there is no pretense of an offense on the part of the company except that they had violated a statute which declared, as to the rates, that it should not lower the rates. The whole question is in a nutshell right here. I am not going to read much from the opinion, but I want to call attention for a moment to it. The court said:

> The question, therefore, to be decided is this: Has a carrier engaged in interstate commerce the power to contract to sell and transport in completion of the contract the commodity sold—

Now, here is the gist of the whole thing—

> when the price stipulated in the contract does not pay the cost of purchase, the cost of delivery, and the published freight rates?

Whenever the railroad company proposes by such a proceeding to violate the statute, as the court considered they did by making the sum total of those things less, so that the published rate is not maintained, then it becomes an offense, and then the court says without any further statute they can deal with this subject. The court said:

> It can not be challenged that the great purpose of the act to regulate commerce, whilst seeking to prevent unjust and unreasonable rates, was to secure equality of rates as to all and to destroy favoritism, these last being accomplished by requiring the publication of tariffs and by prohibiting secret departures from such tariffs, and forbidding rebates, preferences, and all other forms of undue discrimination. To this extent and for these purposes the statute was remedial and is, therefore, entitled to receive that interpretation which reasonably accomplishes the great public purpose which it was enacted to subserve. That a carrier engaged in interstate commerce becomes subject as to such commerce to the commands of the statute and may not set its provisions at naught, whatever otherwise may be its power when carrying on commerce not interstate in character, can not in reason be denied.

That is a recognition, Mr. President, that the carrier may carry on that commerce within the bounds of the State that authorized him to do it, and yet he does not come within the provision of the statute; but whenever he engages in interstate commerce in the transportation of the coal he comes within the provision of the statute. Then the court go on—it is too long to read—to say that in that way the railroad company may discard the published rates, and they declare that he can not.

Now, Mr. President, that is the evil you want to deal with here. You do not want to deal with a proper road. You do not want to deal with a railroad that has been built to carry lumber from the forest to any community, because there has been no question here of its improper use that I know of. It may be that we ought to adopt a general system that no public carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall engage in anything else, but to do that you must wait and take time, and it must be done carefully and in such way that the interests which are already involved and legally involved, the money already invested according to law, may be properly protected.

I doubt very much, Mr. President, whether you can do that with all the different interests unless you shall confine this to one or two articles. If the evil is so great touching coal—and I do not know but that it is—then it would be well to put a stop to it by dealing with that subject and dealing with that subject alone, dealing with the other subjects as the complaint arises and as the opportunity is presented.

Mr. President, I fear myself, as do the Senators from Montana, that a sweeping provision of this character may materially affect the industries of the great West. We have had a hard time to settle up the West. We are in a very prosperous condition to-day, and I believe as a general rule there is not much complaint in the great West against railroad companies engaging in commerce or anything of this kind. As a rule they do not. There may be some exceptions where they are engaged in such production and distribution as ought to be prohibited, but the vice of their production and distribution is not the production and distribution but the abuse they make of it by attempting to avoid and get rid of the statute which declares that they shall publish their rates and adhere to their rates. Punish them, Mr. President, if they do not adhere to the rates. Punish them in some way if they engage in interstate commerce and then make that an excuse for an undue and unjust competition on their part. If they by that system select a man to whom to sell and give him a price they do not give to somebody else, or if they go into the market and buy articles and transport them and give the seller an opportunity they do not give somebody else, that is a violation of existing law, a law the Supreme Court of the United States says is sufficient now to deal with it; but if it is not, we might readily amend it in that particular and leave these other questions until such time as we shall have an opportunity to do so with less danger of doing something out of the way.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, under the rule, as I understand it, I am not entitled to say anything further on the substitute; but I desire to modify it in one or two particulars.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator may modify his proposed amendment. The Secretary will state the modifications.

The SECRETARY. As proposed to be modified the amendment reads:

> It shall be unlawful for any corporation, association, or joint stock company engaged as a common carrier in foreign or interstate commerce to engage, directly or indirectly, through its officers, agents, representatives, employees, directors, or corporations organized for the purpose or otherwise, in the production, manufacture, buying, furnishing or selling of coal, coke, or other commodity of commerce to be transported by and for it as a common carrier beyond the State or Territory where such coal, coke, or other commodity of commerce is produced, manufactured, bought, or the possession thereof is obtained by said corporation, association, or joint stock company. Any violation of this provision shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and the corporation, association, or joint stock company found guilty thereof shall be fined $500 per day for each day it shall unlawfully engage in the production, manufacture, buying, furnishing, or selling as aforesaid: Provided, That when any coal, coke, or other commodity of commerce which is produced, manufactured, bought, furnished, or sold by such corporation, association, or joint stock company is transported by and for it as a common carrier beyond the State or Territory where it is produced, manufactured, bought, furnished, or sold, it shall be prima facie evidence that it was produced, manufactured, bought, furnished, or sold for such transportation: Provided further, That this provision shall not be construed to prohibit such corporation, association, or joint stock company from mining fuel or other commodity exclusively for its own use: Provided further, That this provision shall take effect from and after July 1, 1908.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I voted for the motion to refer this whole subject to a committee. I did so not because I am opposed to whatever legislation is necessary to correct the evils which we all admit exist in some instances and localities, but the difficulty I discover here is, we have not given the subject that careful thought and investigation which is necessary in order to deal with it intelligently, in order to prohibit only that which is wrong and do no injustice to those who are engaged in legitimate enterprises.

All over the West, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has said, there are little railroads which have been built to connect with coal mines and sawmills, that have been built simply to get the product from the mills and the mines. In such cases mining and milling are the principal enterprises. The railroading is merely incidental thereto, and yet those railroads connect with interstate lines, or with other railroads connecting with transcontinental or interstate lines. Hence these small roads doubtless would be held to be engaged in interstate commerce. It seems to me, Mr. President, that a distinction should be made and that proper exceptions should be provided in any legislation that shall be enacted on this subject in order to protect such enterprises. Just what those exceptions should be and just how they should be framed I am not prepared at this moment to say, and it does not seem to me that any other Senator is prepared to say.

It is also apparent that most of the Senators who have discussed this question realize the existence of these difficulties. Just what language is requisite to protect the nonoffending roads, I repeat, I am not able at this moment to state; and, therefore, it occurs to me that the wiser plan will be to refer this matter to a committee, and charge that committee with the duty of investigating the subject and reporting some suitable measure for the Senate to consider.

I know of railroads which have been built to coal mines for the sole purpose of developing them. If this amendment shall become a law the owners of such will be compelled either to dispose of the mines or of the roads, and neither would be of any value without the other.

It is my conviction that legislation of this character should be directed against those transportation lines only that are engaged principally in carrying interstate commerce, and with which mining or other enterprises are merely incidental. It ought not to be applicable to those carriers with whom railroading is merely incidental to the business of their mills or mines. I think Senators will generally agree with me on that proposition.

The question is how this legislation should be framed in order to preserve and protect these rights, the rights of the unoffending, and provide against the evils which we all admit do exist. This brings me back to the proposition that we have not given this subject that consideration necessary to enable us to legislate without great danger of doing a very grave injustice to many industries and enterprises. We can better afford to defer action for a few months than we can afford to do irreparable injury and injustice to numerous legitimate enterprises which have grown up under present conditions.

We have been giving our attention, Mr. President, during the last two or three months almost exclusively to the work of framing a bill designed to empower the Interstate Commerce Commission to prescribe rates and practices for transportation lines engaged in interstate commerce. The attention and thought of the Senate have been given almost entirely to that subject. Now, suddenly this subject is sprung, a subject which, in my judgment, is far more complicated than the main subject of this bill. There has been no proposition brought before the Senate during the present session that is more replete with complications and difficult problems than this one of regulating the relations between transportation and mining and manufacturing industries—none. Yet Senators seem to think that we ought to be able to properly treat a matter of this vast importance and of so complicated a nature and character here on the floor of the Senate without the advice or assistance of a committee that has given it careful investigation.

I am very desirous of supporting some law that will correct the evils which we know exist, but in correcting those evils I do not wish to be a party to perpetrating a great injustice.

I admit that no injury can result if we postpone action on this subject a short time, until a committee has had an opportunity to investigate it. I think if it were referred to a committee it is quite probable a report could be made during the present session. If not, and if the matter should go over until the next session, I think we can bear up under present conditions for a few months longer and would far better do so than do the injustice which I think is very likely to result from hasty and ill-considered action.

I hope, therefore, that no legislation will be enacted unless the subject shall be first referred to a committee that will carefully investigate existing conditions, in order to determine accurately what exceptions are necessary in order to protect those industries which are not offending against the rights or the interests of the people in any respect.

Consider the effect of the proposed legislation on one of the small railroads out West, of which I have spoken, having, we will say, a coal mine in the State of Idaho and a railroad extending therefrom into Washington or Oregon. Such a railroad would be an interstate-commerce line and subject to the prohibitions of the amendments which have been proposed here. This legislation would ruin all such industries and deprive thousands of men of employment. Yet they are offending against no man; they are doing no person and no community an injury or an injustice. They are necessary to and are powerful factors in the development of the resources of the great West. Shall they be stricken down simply because we realize that there are great evils elsewhere which we wish to remedy? Is it necessary to destroy the good in order to correct and restrain the evil? Why must we indulge in this hasty and ill-considered legislation? I sincerely trust the Senate will be disposed to move slowly in this matter. Let us have time to consider it. Let whatever measure which shall be adopted be carefully considered and the proper and necessary exceptions made.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Senate having twice refused by a large majority to refer this matter back to the committee and to postpone some sort of action upon it, it seems to me that——

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think the Senate has refused to refer. The Senate held that a certain motion was out of order. That was not passing an opinion on the question of the merits of reference.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well——

Mr. LODGE. I did not myself vote on it on that basis.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, if we have reached a point in debate here where we can not do what a majority of us want to do, we are in a very deplorable fix, and as the Senate, as I said, has twice refused to entertain those points of order and we have a unanimous-consent agreement which obstructs us from doing what some Senators here want to do, I am especially anxious to reach some modus vivendi by which we can do business and can vote on something.

Mr. LODGE. Why not move to lay the amendment on the table?

Mr. TILLMAN. We have refused to lay the amendment on the table, for I made that motion yesterday afternoon, and I could not get a majority vote for the motion.

Mr. LODGE. Why not try it again?

Mr. TILLMAN. I am afraid to do so after my experience yesterday, because when I have been run over once I am not in a great hurry to be run over again. Moreover, I do not want to lay this matter on the table. It is too serious and vital an issue, and the people of this country are watching to see whether the Senate, knowing that the evil exists, has not got either the sense or the courage to deal with it. That is my understanding of the situation. We all know there are grave abuses and outrageous conditions not only in West Virginia, but in Pennsylvania, in East Tennessee, in the Indian Territory, and I do not know where else. I will read, for the information of the Senate, what very few Senators have ever read since I introduced my report here, some observations I made on this very topic in the brief report which I presented.

The necessity for granting, at some time, relief to producers and shippers in several important particulars not provided for in this bill may be wisely considered in connection with the pending discussion—

I am speaking of the rate making—

There is no provision, except a most vague and indefinite one, for the anomalous and outrageous condition of affairs disclosed as existing in West Virginia. The letter of Governor Dawson, of that State, published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 8, and the memorial of the Red Rock Fuel Company, published in the RECORD of January 29, taken together, disclose a situation that is almost beyond belief. The railroads have seized on the vast mineral wealth of the State in its extensive coal fields and have created a monopoly in that prime necessity of life, fuel.

Landowners who wish to mine and ship their coal are denied access to market, while the roads themselves are engaged extensively in mining and shipping coal; and when private individuals or companies seek to develop their coal lands and send their product to market, the railroads deny or refuse to grant them the privilege of engaging in interstate commerce. In the case of the Red Rock Fuel Company physical connection was refused. They would not permit this coal-mining company to join its track with a switch to the track of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and thus obtain an outlet. In other cases mines have had to shut down because of the denial of cars by the railroads. The coal output, in effect, is controlled absolutely by the railroads in their own interest, and in the case of this particular State the infamy of the situation is aggravated by the fact, which is practically proven—that the three railroad systems entering West Virginia are controlled by an outside road, the Pennsylvania.

And has since been absolutely proven—

There are many other instances in which the proof has been furnished of even more outrageous abuse of power than in the instance cited of the Red Rock Fuel Company case. Where connections between the mines of private companies were already in existence under arrangements made some years ago, the tracks have been torn up and virtual confiscation of the property is threatened. Vested with the rights of eminent domain to construct their lines and granted liberal franchises and charters, the railroads, designed to be public carriers for the benefit of the whole people, in the last few years have become rapidly transformed into the veriest band of robbers—highwaymen who do not thrust their pistols in the faces of their victims and demand money or their lives, but who levy tribute in freight rates which are as high as the traffic will bear, deny access to market, monopolize with brazen effrontery one of the prime necessaries of life—coal—and in every way show their absolute contempt for the people and the people's rights.

The condition of affairs in West Virginia is even worse in Pennsylvania, and from every point of the country come reports that the railroads have practically already obtained control of almost all the coal lands, and where they have not bought the land itself they have obtained mineral leases and are rapidly carrying out the scheme of monopolizing the fuel supply of 85,000,000 people. In Pennsylvania it is charged that they have for years controlled absolutely the State government, and they snap their fingers in contempt at any and every effort to enforce the law and the constitution which prohibits the ownership of coal mines by public carriers. It will be a task of immense difficulty to undo the incalculable mischief and wrong that has already been done.

The plea of vested rights and the complications from the secret transfers, the purchase by holding companies and trust companies, the ramifications of partnerships and of trusteeships, and of other subtle agencies contrived by hundreds of the best legal minds in the country, whose services are at the command of these gigantic corporations, will require firmness, perseverence, and patience by Congress, to grant relief from existing conditions and safeguard the public interests in the future. It is our bounden duty to amend this bill so as to compel every public carrier to give the freest possible access to market to every producer who wishes to engage in interstate commerce.

We should incorporate an amendment in the bill which will compel all railroads to make connections with any and every other railroad, public or private, and grant just and fair traffic arrangements, so as to put every producer upon an equal footing with every other producer. There should also be a provision incorporated in this bill to divorce absolutely the business of transporting freight as a public carrier and the business of producing freight to be transported. The temptation to discriminate against competitors on the part of a public carrier is too great, and it stands to reason that a producer who controls the means of transportation to market at the same time will discriminate against and will in the end destroy every competitor who is in the same business with him.

Now, Senators, we had just as well understand that if we dodge this question and return it to the committee or refuse to do something in regard to it, the people will hold us to account. It is not my business to warn you, but I beg you to do something here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let the amendment be stated.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; it is very long.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want to know what it is.

Mr. FRYE. It has been read four times.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana withdraw his request?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If, as I understand, the amendment is very long, I withdraw the request.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. I should like to have the amendment read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment to the amendment, as follows:

It shall be unlawful for any corporation, association, or joint stock company engaged as a common carrier in foreign or interstate commerce to engage, directly or indirectly, through its officers, agents, representatives, employees, directors, or corporations organized for the purpose, or otherwise, in the production, manufacture, buying, furnishing, or selling of coal, coke, or other commodity of commerce to be transported by and for it as a common carrier beyond the State or Territory where such coal, coke, or other commodity of commerce is produced, manufactured, bought, or the possession thereof is obtained by said corporation, association, or joint stock company. Any violation of this provision shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and the corporation, association, or joint stock company found guilty thereof shall be fined $500 per day for each day it shall unlawfully engage in the production, manufacture, buying, furnishing, or selling as aforesaid: Provided, That when any coal, coke, or other commodity of commerce which is produced, manufactured, bought, furnished, or sold by such corporation, association, or joint stock company is transported by and for it as a common carrier beyond the State or Territory where it is produced, manufactured, bought, furnished, or sold, it shall be prima facie evidence that it was produced, manufactured, bought, furnished, or sold for such transportation: Provided further, That this provision shall not be construed to prohibit such corporation, association, or joint stock company from mining fuel or other commodities exclusively for its own use: Provided further, That this provision shall take effect from and after July 1, 1908.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SPOONER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], who is absent. He is in accord with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] on all questions arising under this bill. I therefore can not tell whether I can vote or not until after the Senator from South Carolina has voted. In this instance, if agreeable to him, I vote "nay."

Mr. GAMBLE. I inquire whether the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. GAMBLE. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GAMBLE subsequently said: I observe that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] is now present, and I desire to vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 11, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—11.

Bacon	Culberson	La Follette	Taliaferro
Berry	Dubois	McEnery	Warren
Clarke, Ark.	Gearin	Money

So the amendment of Mr. CULBERSON, in the nature of a substitute, to the amendment of Mr. ELKINS was rejected.

Mr. ELKINS. I now offer a substitute for the original amendment I introduced.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from West Virginia will allow the vote to be taken on his original motion, I think we can take it without debate. I wish myself to vote for it, although I believe it will be voted down. Then the vote can be taken on the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi, and that will allow every Senator to express his opinion on both. I think it can be disposed of more readily in that way than it can in any other. I make that suggestion in the interest of a prompt disposition of the matter.

Mr. ELKINS. I hope the Senator will not press that suggestion, because I want a vote on the substitute.

Mr. BAILEY. I am going to have a vote on the most drastic proposition, and I shall offer the Senator's abandoned proposition in lieu of the one he now offers.

Mr. ELKINS. Does the Senator mean the amendment as amended by the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will allow us to vote on the original proposition, as corrected in accordance with my suggestion, and that is voted down, then the Senator from Mississippi has a proposition, and we will vote on it, and I believe we can do it all without debate.

Mr. ELKINS. I have offered that as a substitute now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the substitute be read.

Mr. ELKINS. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The substitute proposed by the Senator from West Virginia will be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia as amended, it is proposed to insert the following:

From and after May, 1908, it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to transport from any State, Territory, or district of the United States to any other State, Territory, or district of the United States, or to any foreign country, any article or commodity manufactured, mined, or produced by it or under its authority, or which it may own in whole or in part, or in which it may have any interest, direct or indirect, except such articles or commodities as may be necessary or used in the conduct of its business as a common carrier.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I wish to say a word. I do not think the amendment will be effective. The evil sought to be remedied, as I understand, is that railroad companies own coal mines and monopolize the production and the carriage of this property. The substitute does not in any manner prevent their continuing to own the coal mines or continuing to transport the coal, so long as that transportation is limited to the particular State in which the coal mines are located and the railroad is situated. We will take, for illustration, the coal mines in the State of Pennsylvania, in which State, I believe, most of them are that would be reached by this proposed legislation. So long as those companies have the coal mines in the State of Pennsylvania and their railroads within the State of Pennsylvania, they can still own the mines and still transport the coal to the termini of those railroads inside the State of Pennsylvania. In other words, the railroad companies will still own the coal mines and still monopolize the transportation, say to the port of Philadelphia; and so long as they limit themselves to that and do not transport beyond the limits of the State of Pennsylvania the proposed amendment will not touch them.

Now, in what manner will that cure the evil? I repeat, so long as they continue to own the mines and to operate the mines and to monopolize the transportation, exclusively monopolize the transportation of coal, limiting themselves to the carriage simply to the port of Philadelphia, unless it is intended thereafter to be carried to other points, this proposed legislation will not touch them. In other words, they will go on just as they are now.

For that reason I think the original amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia is very much more effective than this, and I do not think this will be effective in any degree if my construction of it is correct.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, no law of Congress can control the transportation of any article taken up inside and put down inside of a State. But no carrier can be or will be permitted to withdraw its interstate commerce from the jurisdiction of the Federal Government by consigning it twice, because if it starts from one State and finally goes into another State or into a foreign country the Federal Government's jurisdiction attaches.

As for my part, I do not believe this amendment, although it meets the approval of some of the most earnest friends of this legislation and some of the most distinguished lawyers on this side, goes far enough. I want to make an absolute prohibition against any common carrier engaging in interstate commerce, if it likewise engages in these prohibited industries. But I recognize that we have no power to prohibit anybody within a State engaging in those industries, and therefore I want the prohibition directed against participation in interstate commerce by any carrier who engages in those prohibited industries.

But, Mr. President, if the Senate does not agree with me, and if this substitute goes as far as the Congress at this time is willing to go, I shall not consume any time in a fruitless debate. But I do believe that the Senator from West Virginia, and all other Senators, ought to be willing to take the sense of this body as to which of these propositions shall prevail. There are more than several of us who believe that the absolute, complete, and full prohibition against the common carrier ought to be enacted. There are others, I fear a majority, who feel that in striving to separate the common carrier from the business of mining and other forms of production we might seriously interrupt the commerce of the country. Those represent, as I believe, the two views in the Senate. The Senator from West Virginia proposes the second view as a substitute for the first, and if it is adopted, then those who believe in the first have no opportunity for taking the sense of the Senate. I appeal to him and to the Senate that as they are the two propositions we may have a fair vote on each of them.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. It is for a question. Does the Senator consider that both propositions are in the amendment originally offered by the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not. I think——

Mr. DANIEL. I hardly thought so, and I want to suggest this to the Senator from Texas: There will be no trouble in offering the separate idea, whereas if you put the two ideas together, you direct against the amendment the antagonism to both which might not exist as to one of them. Therefore there can be no trouble in adopting the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, and that and the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi are both identical with an amendment of which I gave notice day before yesterday, and which I have not had the opportunity to offer.

I am glad to see that on both sides of the Chamber the views which I had the honor to present are being practically adopted. I do not wish to confuse by any effort of my own or by mingling with another idea the chance to get through one good thing. I suggest to the Senator would it not be better to let this amendment be adopted, with any verbal alterations he may desire to make, and then put the other idea separately and for itself.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course I can reach my end, and I will reach it. The Senator from West Virginia can have a vote on the proposition now, and when we go into the Senate I can offer a substitute for what we adopt now.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I rose to suggest.

Mr. BAILEY. With notice that I shall do that, I will not further delay a vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that it may be read.

Mr. CARTER. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senators from Virginia and Montana, it will be again reported by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia as amended it is proposed to insert the following:

> From and after May, 1908, it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to transport from any State, Territory, or district of the United States to any other State, Territory, or district of the United States or to any foreign country any article or commodity manufactured, mined, or produced by it or under its authority or which it may own in whole or in part, or in which it may have any interest, direct or indirect, except such articles or commodities as may be necessary or used in the conduct of its business as a common carrier.

Mr. BACON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BACON. This, as I understand, it is proposed to substitute for the pending amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. BACON. The inquiry I desire to make of the Chair is this: In case the substitute is adopted, will the Chair still hold that there is a vote to be had on the amendment as amended?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that it is equivalent to a motion to strike out and insert, and that the substitute if adopted will stand in lieu of the original amendment.

Mr. BACON. And then be put to a vote?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will not require an additional vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. It will require an additional vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As it is a complete substitute——

Mr. ALDRICH. The question will be first on the substitution of this for the other amendment, and then upon the adoption of the amendment as amended.

Mr. BACON. The reason I propounded the inquiry is that there are some who would oppose it as a substitute who would vote for it if it were a final proposition. Therefore I desired to know in advance how that would be.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My attention was distracted for the moment while the proposition was being read by the Secretary, and in order to identify it without calling again for its reading, I should like to inquire whether it is the same proposition that was offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN]?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands it is precisely the same.

Mr. CLAY. I may have misunderstood the ruling of the Chair, but, as I understand, it was this: If a majority of the Senate shall vote in favor of adopting the substitute in lieu of the amendment, that is equivalent to agreeing to the amendment as amended. As I understand, the parliamentary situation is this: Senators may prefer this amendment in lieu of the original amendment, and at the same time Senators may be opposed to either amendment. As I understand, after this amendment is voted on, if it is accepted in lieu of the original amendment, then the first amendment must be put to the Senate for its approval.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If it is the desire, the Chair will, of course, put the question on the amendment as amended. Yet it seems useless, as the substitute is to stand in lieu of the original amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. But it might be rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

The substitute was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia as amended.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let us have the yeas and nays, please.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 67, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—67.

Aldrich	Culberson	Hansbrough	Nixon
Allee	Cullom	Hemenway	Overman

So the amendment of Mr. ELKINS as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ELKINS. I offer an amendment to come in after section 1.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of section 1 the following:

Any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall promptly, upon application of any shipper tendering interstate traffic for transportation, construct, maintain, and operate upon reasonable terms a switch connection with any private side track which may be constructed to connect with its railroad, where such connection is reasonably practicable and can be put in with safety and will furnish sufficient business to justify the construction and maintenance of the same; and shall furnish cars for the movement of such traffic to the best of its ability without discrimination in favor of or against any such shipper.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 18, before the word "The," insert:

The term common carrier as used in this act shall include express companies and sleeping car companies.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. In the print of May 8——

Mr. LODGE. Where does it come in?

The SECRETARY. It reads:

After the last line of the substitute of the senior Senator from Texas to the amendment of the senior Senator from Ohio.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To what point in the bill does the Senator from Missouri address his amendment?

Mr. WARNER. It is not in the printed bill. It comes in after the last line of the substitute of the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. I can not give the line.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert:

It shall be the duty of carriers engaged in interstate commerce to give like accommodations to all persons paying the same compensation for interstate transportation of passengers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read.

Mr. DANIEL. Is the amendment offered to a pending section?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that it is offered as an independent proposition to come in at the end of section 1.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that it may be read once more.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment, at the request of the Senator from Virginia.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 1, after the amendment already agreed to at that place, insert:

It shall be the duty of carriers engaged in interstate commerce to give like accommodations to all persons paying the same compensation for interstate transportation of passengers.

Mr. FORAKER. I move to amend the amendment as offered by the Senator from Missouri by striking out the word "like," in line 2 of his amendment, and inserting in lieu thereof "equally good service and;" so as to read, "to give equally good service and accommodations."

Mr. MONEY. That is right.

Mr. WARNER. I have no objection to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri modifies his amendment as suggested by the Senator from Ohio. The modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the word "like," in line 2, and insert "equally good service and."

Mr. BACON. So as to read?

The SECRETARY. So as to read:

It shall be the duty of carriers engaged in interstate commerce to give equally good service and accommodations to all persons paying the same compensation for interstate transportation of passengers.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, we had some discussion on this question a few days ago. I desire to say for myself—I have had no opportunity to confer with others, but the amendment now offered by the Senator from Ohio is a very great improvement on the one offered before, and so far as I know it is unobjectionable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. ELKINS. I offer an amendment, found on page 161 of the printed amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add the following as a separate paragraph at the end of section 1, after the amendments already agreed to at that place:

That any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall promptly, upon application of any connecting lateral or branch line, and upon reasonable terms, make connections and fair, just, and reasonable prorating arrangements and division of joint or through rates with such connecting branch or lateral lines.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read.

Mr. DOLLIVER. It seems to me that that is already in the bill. There is a provision in the bill which provides for the order of the Commission making through rates and just and reasonable rates applicable to them.

Mr. ELKINS. It is not covered by the bill. I differ from the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes seem to have it.

Mr. ELKINS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer an amendment found on page 27 of the printed amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 13, after the word "thereto," insert:

That on and after January 1, 1909, every railroad company doing an interstate-commerce business shall furnish all freight cars, whether refrigerator, cold-storage, or other specially constructed or designed cars for the carriage of special merchandise, necessary for the conduct of its business as a common carrier, and shall furnish at just and reasonable rates all icing and other service necessary or proper for the protection of any goods in transit; and on and after such date no such railroad company shall enter into any contract with the owner or shipper of any goods to ship the same in the cars of such owner or shipper or pay any rental for such cars.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, all I have to say is that the amendment is aimed at the destruction finally of the private car system. It gives time enough, two years and a half or three years, in which to make the change, and after the expiration of three years then the railroads must furnish their own cars and not use the cars of private companies. It will abolish that system after the year 1908. I do not care about making any argument upon it. I would just as soon have a vote now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McLAURIN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1 of the bill, line 8——

Mr. LODGE. What is the page in the printed amendments?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not among the printed amendments. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out on page 1 all between the word "property," in line 8, and the word "from," in line 11.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the provision be read as it would read if amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the provision as it would stand if amended.

Mr. McLAURIN. I ask that the clause beginning with the word "wholly," in line 8, to the word "shipment," in line 11, may be read, and then that that part of the section shall be read as it will stand if this amendment shall be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. After the word "property," in line 8, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

Wholly by railroad (or partly by railroad and partly by water when both are used under a common control, management, or arrangement for a continuous carriage or shipment).

So as to read:

SEC. 1. That the provisions of this act shall apply to any common carrier or carriers engaged in the transportation of passengers or property from one State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, to any other State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, or from one place in a Territory to another place in the same Territory, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOPKINS. Let the Secretary proceed with the reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read section 2 of the bill, beginning on page 3.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not understand that we had left section 1.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. We have left section 1.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There is an amendment which I desire to offer to follow section 1.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Strictly speaking, the amendment would not be in order, but if there is no objection the Chair will entertain the motion to amend.

Mr. LODGE. Where is it proposed to insert the amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. At the end of section 1.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Following the last amendment adopted at the foot of section 1?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LODGE. Before section 2?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Before section 2.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I simply rose because I understand the Chair to have ruled in a way which might affect future proceedings. The Chair will, perhaps, recall that a few days ago we discussed the very question whether or not if a section were passed it would be in order for a Senator thereafter who might for any reason have failed to offer his amendment at that time to return and offer it. It was then the general consensus of opinion that such would be the case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair's interpretation of the rule is that after the bill is read by sections for amendment, in the manner in which it is being read now, before it leaves the Committee of the Whole the bill will still be in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. BACON. To any section?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To any section. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEAN. Before the Secretary reads the amendment, I have an amendment to this whole section that I will offer and have printed. I will say to the Senate that it is practically the section that was in the Interstate Commerce Commission bill. It is not entirely, but very nearly that section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed. The Secretary will read the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The SECRETARY. After the last amendment, just agreed to, insert the following, to be known as section 1a:

SECTION 1a. That section 4 of said act be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. The Commission created by this act may, in its discretion, upon notice and hearing, prohibit any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act from charging or receiving any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or like kind of property for a shorter than for a longer distance, over the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, or may, upon such notice and hearing, prescribe the extent to which such greater compensation may be received; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge or receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I only wish to say a word in support of the amendment which I have offered. The long and short haul section of the law of 1887 was designed to prevent discriminations as between places. As construed by the Supreme Court it is in the power of the railroad companies to create and maintain conditions which nullify the law. This they have done until every State suffers on account of discriminations which the section as originally enacted was intended to prohibit. Every section of our country offers examples of higher charges for a short haul than for hauls that are much longer—the shorter haul being within and a part of the longer haul.

The amendment proposes to invest the Commission with authority to determine under what conditions the long and short haul principle shall be applied. If adopted as a part of this bill, it will be enforced only upon complaint and investigation which convinces the Commission that justice requires that it should be enforced. Precisely this amendment was recommended by the Commission in 1897, and that recommendation has been reaffirmed and repeated in every report which the Commission has submitted to Congress from 1897 to the present time.

The bill presented to the Senate by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and now under consideration, reenacts the old law, and reenacts in section 4 the provision which as construed by the Supreme Court, as I said a moment ago, enables a railroad company to nullify the purpose of Congress when it enacted that section in the law of 1887.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Wisconsin. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. ALGER], and I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GAMBLE. Has the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He did not vote.

Mr. GAMBLE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Nevada, and therefore withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bacon	Cullom	McLaurin	Stone
Bailey	Daniel	Martin	Taliaferro
Berry	Dubois	Money	Teller
Blackburn	Frazier	Overman	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	La Follette	Pettus

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 9, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Journal be approved.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the Journal be approved.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I move the following change of reference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves the following change of reference, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18444) to prevent the loss of life through accidents to passengers at elevator shafts, from the Committee on Accounts to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution No. 419.

Whereas no examination of the expenditures in the Department of Agriculture has been made by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture for a number of years and such an examination is now necessary in the interest of the public service; and

Whereas said examination can not be had by said committee unless authority therefor is conferred upon said committee: Therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture is hereby authorized to examine, so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned, all of the matters referred to in paragraph 42 of Rule XI of the House of Representatives, and for that purpose it may send for persons and papers; and said committee is authorized to employ a competent stenographer while conducting said examination, and to sit during the sessions of the House, and to report the result of its examination with any recommendations to the House.

Any expenses incurred hereunder to be paid from the contingent fund of the House on the certificate of the chairman of the committee and approval of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word concerning the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. CASSEL. For a question.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CASSEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi the time yielded me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I will not need five minutes. I want to say merely that I think this is a proper step to take and the right course to pursue for this Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, and to express my hope that the other committees on expenditures in the several Departments will wake up to the fact that they have a very important work to do. The most important committees of this House, if they do their duty, for the purposes of economy and honesty of administration, are the committees on expenditures in the several Departments. I am glad that this particular Committee on Expenditures is taking this step, and I hope it will be imitated by the other committees on expenditures in the other Departments.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18750—the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, to save the time of the House, and at the same time determine whether there be a quorum present, I call for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 242, nays 4, answered "present" 12, not voting 123, as follows:

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18750—the naval appropriation bill—with Mr. CRUMPACKER in the chair.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] have sufficient time in which to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] is entitled to the floor in support of his motion to amend. His colleague from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to conclude his remarks in support of his amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To conclude his remarks in the RECORD?

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the floor. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I call for the reading of the amendment, in order that it may be recalled to the minds of the members of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will again be reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say at the outset that I yield to no one in my love for the American Navy, for the grand ships from the days of the Ranger and the Bon Homme Richard down to the days of the Olympia and the Oregon, and I yield to no one in my admiration for the gallant men of the Navy from the days of John Paul Jones down to our gallant Admiral Dewey.

But it is not of the Navy upon the sea of which I will talk to-day, but the business question of the administration of naval affairs upon land.

I have found in my study of this administration a concrete example of what it means to manufacture material in the Government navy-yards as compared with what it would cost to buy the same material of equal quality upon the open market, and this information I desire to present to each one of you, and I hope I may have your careful attention. It was my good fortune at one time, eight years ago, for a brief period to be attached to the United States Navy. But that brief time does not give me title to speak authoritatively as a naval man by any means, but all my life I have been engaged in business dealings with the two subjects which I shall take up. I have in my business shared in the ownership of twenty or thirty vessels, at the present time three, one of them the largest steel lumber carrier upon the Great Lakes, carrying twelve hundred thousand feet of lumber at a cargo. I only mention this that I may indicate I am not without some practical knowledge of the subject I shall take up, and that subject is the manufacture in the Boston Navy-Yard of anchors, chains, and cordage. The basis of my information will be found on page 7 of the Report of the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment for 1905 and hearing 49 of Rear-Admiral Manney before the Naval Committee.

The total amount of chain iron and billets rolled amounted to 2,991,600 pounds, costing $140,108.16.

The following table indicates the total output of the plant during the year, together with the cost thereof:

I take, first, the subject of anchors manufactured during last year, and I find in the last item at the bottom of page 7 the output was 605,483 pounds, costing $81,564.12, or 13½ cents a pound. Please keep that figure in mind. Thirteen and one-half cents per pound by that report. On page 418 of the hearings you will find the cost of anchors of private make, according to a statement of Admiral Manney, as 5½ cents for anchors under 1,000 pounds, and 6 to 8½ cents for anchors over 1,000 pounds.

I have further information on this subject from the Department of Commerce and Labor, Light-House Establishment, who paid for forged fluke anchors 5¾ to 6 cents per pound; also that forged stockless anchors cost 6 cents a pound. The Newport News Shipbuilding Company, in a letter of March 9, state:

With regard to anchors, I beg to say that while the price varies with market conditions, from 7 to 7½ cents per pound would be a fair average to figure for forged anchors.

From a letter of the Treasury Department Revenue-Cutter Service, dated March 15, I am advised that they have paid from 4¾ to 6½ cents per pound for forged anchors.

I find that one of the largest shipbuilding companies in the United States, who lately constructed ships for the Light-House Service, furnished forged anchors weighing 11,925 pounds, costing $4.98 per hundred pounds, or practically 5 cents per pound, while the cost of anchors made by the Navy Department, shown by report of Bureau of Equipment, is 13½ cents per pound.

I find that Admiral Manney, on page 418 in the hearing No. 49, gives the cost of an 8,000-pound anchor of the factory at Boston at $17.65 a hundred; one of 14,500 pounds at $15.39 per hundred, which makes the relative cost in these instances 5 cents furnished the Government light-house boats as against 16 cents for the Government navy manufacture. As forged anchors have become nearly obsolete, because of steel stockless anchors being used instead, I have not very much data on the subject of forged anchors. The cost of steel anchors is shown to be about 4 cents a pound.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LOUD. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. McNARY. I would like to ask the gentleman whether anchors made by forging at Boston Navy-Yard would not cost a great deal more than the cast anchors made by private companies, and if the difference between the cost of the forged anchor and the cast anchor is because of the difference of the cost of the material and the method of manufacture from being forged and the other cast?

Mr. LOUD. I have not touched upon the subject of cast anchors at all, but only forged anchors, and I have made no comparison. I shall talk from first to last upon the subject of forged anchors alone. But if you touch upon the subject of cast anchors, I will only say that the Minnesota, which is the largest ship upon the Pacific, is furnished with cast anchors, and those cast anchors cost $3.65 a hundred, and the gentleman can have that as a comparison.

Mr. McNARY. The gentleman well knows that merchant ships do not have to anchor at sea in open roadsteads as the Government vessels have. The gentleman understands that very well.

Mr. LOUD. I can not understand what you say.

Mr. McNARY. Let me say that the gentleman understands very well the anchors used by merchant vessels differ materially from anchors for Government vessels, as the Government ships have to anchor in open roadsteads, while merchant ships go to a wharf. The men-of-war not only have to anchor in open roadsteads, but under conditions of warfare may be compelled to anchor at sea.

Mr. LOUD. I furnished the gentleman the price paid by the Government for anchors for the Revenue-Cutter Service and the Light-House Service.

Mr. McNARY. And the gentleman also gave the figure for the anchors of the Minnesota, which is a merchant vessel.

Mr. LOUD. That is a small part of the subject, so that I will pass on to the subject of cable chains. In the first item of the table given at the bottom of page 7 of the report of the Bureau of Equipment, I find that half-inch chain cable, 2,628 pounds, cost $632.78, showing a cost per pound of 24 cents; five-eighths-inch cable, 2,887 pounds, costing $793.01, showing a cost per pound of 27½ cents, the highest market quotation of these sizes running from the common chain, $3.60 per hundred, to the highest grade, $8.40 per 100 pounds, for half-inch chain; and in this connection I will say that the purchasing department of the isthmian canal, on April 28, purchased three-eighths-inch straight short-link iron chain at $3.94 per hundred pounds, delivered on the dock at Colon. The whole amount involved in the business of making these one-half and five-eighths inch chains is so small it is of little importance; nevertheless it shows the expense of Government manufacture to be abnormally large; that is, the cost at the Government factory being three times the market price of private-made chain of the very highest quality. I will add to the above information that the market price quoted is for best special handmade dredge chain——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Right there I want to ask the gentleman a question for information. How much was the price of this product before the Government began to make it in the navy-yards?

Mr. LOUD. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It has not fallen any.

Mr. YOUNG. The Government making it at the navy-yards certainly did not reduce the price to one-third of the cost at the Government navy-yards.

Mr. LOUD. The market price of best special dredge handmade chain is $8.40 per 100 pounds for half-inch and $7.40 for five-eighths-inch.

Mr. McNARY. I should like to ask the gentleman whether Admiral Manney has not stated to his committee that the Government chain is much superior to the chain made by private contractors—stronger and much superior? I should like to have the gentleman answer that question.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman will read it from the hearing, I will accept his reading.

Mr. McNARY. All right. I will read as regards wire rope first.

Mr. LOUD. I am not on the subject of wire rope, and I will not yield for that.

Mr. McNARY. All right. We will come right down to the question of chain:

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Now, you say that the contract work is not as good as that done in the yard?

Admiral MANNEY. Contract work that we have had done from the Lebanon Chain Works has shown up upon test to have the strength necessary to pass it. The method of welding the links is inferior to that employed at the yard. The yard uses the end weld; in the large commercial chains purchased the side weld is employed. This is objectionable, as the two sides of the link are then not symmetrical in strength. The part of the link which has been oftenest heated and pounded has not the same texture as the other part.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Does your test show inferiority in the manufacture of chains?

Admiral MANNEY. The breaks show where the weakest part is, and the links having the end weld have been found the stronger.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will they not weld them at the end if you demand it?

Admiral MANNEY. No; they state that they can not. It would increase the cost.

Mr. LOUD. Admitting that Admiral Manney has so stated, we can not blame him for that, because it was his own factory of which he was speaking; and against that we have the evidence of all the consumers of chain in the United States, for dredges or great cranes, where the best chain is wanted. They find no difficulty, for the most severe service, in buying chain for any particular service that may be required. And I will say further that no comparison has been made. It is merely the statement of an interested witness in the matter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is Admiral Manney interested in the manufacture of chain?

Mr. LOUD. The manufacture I am speaking of is carried on in a Government navy-yard under his supervision.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, well, he is simply an officer in charge of the work. I hope the gentleman does not mean to reflect upon the Admiral by making that statement. It is hard to believe that he does.

Mr. LOUD. I can not yield for anything more on that subject. Now, taking up the subject of the heavy anchor chains or cables——

Mr. ROBERTS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LOUD. I do not care to yield any further.

Mr. ROBERTS. I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. LOUD. I do not yield any further at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. LOUD. In the letter dated March 3, 1906, written me by the Industrial Works, Bay City, Mich., makers of the largest and highest grade locomotive and railroad wrecking cranes, on which only the choicest quality of chain is used, they say:

As to chains: The best quality, however, of handmade dredge chain is worth, in sizes from 1 to 1¼ inches diameter, 7½ cents per pound f. o. b. factory.

Taking up the subject of heavy anchor chains and cables, the same table, at the bottom of page 7, shows that—

1 3/16-inch costs 16 cents per pound.
1¼-inch costs 12⅛ cents per pound.
1⅜-inch costs 12½ cents per pound.
1⅝-inch costs 11⅛ cents per pound.

Or an average of 13 cents per pound. Keep that figure in your minds, gentlemen; 13 cents a pound for these sizes of chains made in the Government factories. A letter from one of the largest shipbuilding companies in the United States, for building ocean steamships, shows the cost of chain furnished in these sizes varies from $3.32 to $4.15 per hundred pounds. As to cables 2 inches and larger, referring to the table at the bottom of page 7, we find the following items of output and cost, to which I have added the cost per pound derived from the figures that are there given:

Noticing that these figures vary from 9½ cents per pound for 2⅞-inch to 13½ cents for 2⅝-inch cables, without apparent reason for the wide divergence in cost, I have put the figures together in these six items:

Size.	Output.	Cost.	Average cost per pound.
	Pounds.
2 inches	227,148	$22,004.43	$0.0966
2 1/16 inches	30,200	3,624.00	.1200
2¼ inches	11,816	1,119.20	.1000
2½ inches	878,733	94,560.87	.1075
2⅝ inches	1,011,941	133,241.50	.1320
2¾ inches	218,422	20,805.90	.0950
Total	2,378,260	275,355.90	.1158

We therefore find that the average cost of all the cable manufactured, 2-inch and upward, was $11.58 per 100 pounds, the largest item being 2⅝-inch cable, shown above to have cost $13.20 per 100 pounds.

While Admiral Manney, in hearing No. 49, for comparison between Government cost and contract price paid to private manufacturers, has stated that the Government cost was 9½ cents, or $9.50 per 100 pounds, I believe that we must hold that the cost of this item is not to be considered as the average Government cost, but we must take the average cost of $11.58 per 100 pounds; or if we wish to be more particular, we must take jointly the last two items of 2⅝ inches and 2¾ inches in above table, which, if so considered, would make the average price of these two items $12.50 per 100 pounds.

While this indicates the cost of the output of the Government shops, it is not the actual or full cost. The first, second, and tenth items in table at bottom of page 5, Report of Bureau of Equipment, viz:

Office and store labor, handling coal, shipments, annual leave, etc	$103,428.82
Repairs and additions and maintenance of machinery plant	56,157.33
Miscellaneous articles	53,262.09
Total	212,848.24

This amount, $212,848.24, together with other items not given, must be spread to a more or less extent over the seven items of output shown in that table to give the real cost.

If spread evenly or pro rata, this increases by 12½ per cent or more the cost shown in tables on page 7. By adding 12½ per cent to $12.50 we have $14 per 100 pounds, or 14 cents per pound, the actual cost of the 2⅝-inch and 2¾-inch cable made in the Government shop.

From evidence given in the hearing we find the largest size battleship cables—2⅞ inch—have been made by contract by private firms—9¼ cents per pound for cables made by the Lebanon Chain Works and 8⅞ cents per pound for cables contracted for, but not delivered, by the Monongahela Iron and Steel Works.

I wish to state here that upon careful consideration of the subject it is my belief that all of the battle-ship cables desired of this specification, any size, can be purchased by contract at from 6 cents to 7 cents per pound under the same specification as to strength or breaking strain as now required, but eliminating the absurd and impossible chemical specification, especially as to sulphur content, which has the effect of ruling out competition and forcing the Government to pay a needlessly high price.

As to anchor cables larger than 2 inches, I can give you the following information: One of the largest ocean shipbuilding firms in the United States advises me that they pay $4.15 per 100 pounds for 2½-inch anchor cables, $4.30 per 100 pounds for 2¼ inch, and $3.85 per 100 pounds for 2 1/16 inch.

Large freighters on the Great Lakes, last built, for 2⅛-inch tested stud-link cable chains paid $3.30 per 100 pounds.

I am advised by Cramp & Sons Shipbuilding Company that the 2⅝-inch anchor cables furnished by them to the Russian cruiser Retvizan, British admiralty test, was $4.50 per 100 pounds, while the 2⅛-inch cable furnished the cruiser Variag, British admiralty test, was $3.70 per 100 pounds.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company, in their letter of March 23, advise me that they pay for 1⅞-inch stud-link tested cable chain $4.50 per 100 pounds, f. o. b. Philadelphia, for steamship Costa Rica; also 1⅜-inch and 1¼-inch tested stud-link cable chain for steamship City of Para and steamship Barracouta, both at $3.60 per 100 pounds, delivered in New York; also 1⅞-inch tested stud-link cable chain for steamship Acapulco at $3.74 per 100 pounds, delivered in New York.

In a letter from the Upson-Walton Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, which I believe is the largest ship chandlery firm on the Great Lakes, we find the following paragraph relating to chains:

"We do not sell the chains for the new steamers that are fitting out on the Lakes, the margin being so close on these goods that the manufacturers sell them direct. Our cost price is the same, we are told, as the price charged the shipyards, and on the regular grade of chain, such as is used by these parties, the cost up to 2 inches to-day is $3.56 per 100 pounds, freight allowed to Cleveland from factory, and on the best quality of dredge chain the cost on the same sizes is $4.75 per 100 pounds, this being, however, a much finer quality of chain than is used on the Lakes."

From the American Ship Building Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, I have the following:

MARCH 17, 1906.

Hon. GEORGE A. LOUD, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of the 14th instant, you of course know that we do comparatively nothing in the line of Government work here on the Lakes, and I am not therefore able to give you any idea as to the cost of chain cable made to Government specifications. It is my opinion, however, that your estimate of 6 cents ought not to be far out of the way.

We have purchased during the past five years somewhere between 2,000 and 3,000 tons (100 carloads) of stud link chain cable for use in merchant work, and an average price during that period would be a fraction under your estimate of 4 cents.

Hoping this will give you the information you desire, I am,
Yours, respectfully,

N. S. THRASHER,
Purchasing Agent.

It is perfectly understood by me that these cables for merchant service, costing from $3.30 to $4.30 per 100 pounds, are not up to the specifications of the United States Navy, and are not given for comparison, but are given to show that all vessels outside of the United States Navy are equipped with cables costing less than 5 cents per pound in size 2⅝ inches and under, this being the largest size brought to my notice, with the exception of the four steamers on the Pacific, the Minnesota, Dakota, Manchuria, and Mongolia.

The cables on the Minnesota and Dakota are 3 3/16 inches in diameter, and the price paid for them was $5.43 per 100 pounds delivered at New London, Conn.

Quoting from a letter of the Eastern Shipbuilding Company, under date of March 21, we find the following:

"You are right in assuming that the price which we paid for those chains was high, but you must realize that these were very difficult chains to make, the weight of each link being as much as one man could handle. Smaller size chain, of course cost very much less, as you note from my previous letter that the 1⅞-inch chain cost $3.75 per 100 pounds (this size chain being large enough for most ships built in this country). I wish to impress upon you, however, that Lloyd's inspection greatly increases the cost of the chain, as their test is very severe, involving much handling of same, cutting out of links, etc."

There was doubt expressed by Admiral Manney before the committee (see hearing No. 49) as to these cables being inspected. The cost of Lloyd's inspection adds one-half cent per pound to all chains so inspected. (Lebanon Chain Works, January 12.)

As to these particular chains being inspected, we find by letter from the Eastern Shipbuilding Company, under date of March 17, the following:

"These chain cables are 3 3/16 inch in diameter; they were the largest ever manufactured at that time, and it was deemed of great importance that same should have very careful inspection; therefore these chains were inspected by Lloyd's local inspector at the chain works by Lloyd's principal surveyor in this country, and again by Lloyd's surveyor after same had arrived at the works of the Eastern Shipbuilding Company."

The chain cables were manufactured by Lebanon Chain Works and the steel anchors were made by Seaboard Steel Casting Company. The 3 3/16-inch chain cost $5.43 per 100 pounds; the 1⅞-inch chain cost $3.75 per 100 pounds, and the anchors cost $3.65 per 100 pounds.

In conclusion, I wish to state that the S. S. Minnesota and Dakota were built under the rules of Lloyd's Register of Shipping, and all machinery, appliances, etc., pertaining to these ships were also classed by Lloyd's (who were very rigid in their inspection), and all received the highest certificates of classification issued by said society.

Of course you know that Lloyd's is a British Society. Owners find it necessary, owing to insurance of both ship and cargo, to have Lloyd's classification.

As to the cost of the cables furnished by the builders of the Manchuria and Mongolia, we find the size to be 3⅛ inches and price paid $5.36 per 100 pounds.

I am advised by the manufacturers of these cables that the same ratio of strength and breaking strain was given to these cables as is required for the 2⅞-inch Government battle-ship cables.

From all this data we find that the very best anchor cables supplied to any ship built in the United States outside of the United States Navy cost $5.45 per 100 pounds, the same being tested to the same breaking strain as required by the United States Navy, and as compared with this cost it has cost the Government $13 to $14 per 100 pounds for the same quality of cable.

It is presumable that the reply or explanation of why the Government cables cost so much more than cables made by private firms is that the material costs so much more. While in a small measure this is true, the difference in cost of material being about 2 cents per pound, sustaining this phase of the question, I find in a letter of April 20, from the Bureau of Equipment, the statement that the last three contracts made during the last two years with the Monongahela Iron and Steel Company covered 2,800 tons, at $87.36 per ton, showing that this company have sold to the Boston yard this amount of material, costing $244,608, the price per pound being $4.37 per 100 pounds.

Permit me to state my belief that this excessive price is solely due to the needless specification in the chemical analysis of the material, principally relating to sulphur content.

The specification that iron shall not contain more than one hundredth of 1 per cent sulphur rules out practically, and I believe effectively, all competition, giving this company an absolute monopoly and enabling them to maintain an unreasonably high price for their iron.

I am sustained in this opinion by the following letter from the chemist at the United States Navy-Yard:

UNITED STATES NAVY-YARD,
Washington, D. C., March 16, 1906.

Hon. GEORGE A. LOUD, M. C.,
House of Representatives, United States.

SIR: It gives me great pleasure to be able to comply with your request in letter of the 14th instant, received last night.

Samples of chain iron from Lebanon Chain Works, marked and reported as stated below, showed the following composition:

	July 21, 1904.		Aug. 9, 1904.
	No. 1.	No. 2.	No. 3.	No. 4.
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
Carbon	a 0.010	a 0.010	0.0196	0.019
Silicon	.150	.140	.1410	.131
Sulphur	.019	.018	.0200	.022
Phosphorus	.061	.062	.0550	.059
Manganese	.070	.075	.0820	.060

a Below.

While these results do not exactly agree with the specifications, it is my opinion that the iron is of very good quality. It is also my opinion that even for the best iron makers it will be a somewhat difficult proposition to always keep within the requirements of the specifications. A deviation, such as above results show, should, in my opinion, not be cause for rejection.

Trusting that this will answer your inquiry, and always ready to furnish any information which I possess and you should desire, I am,

Very respectfully, yours,

JOS. WESTISSON,
Chemist, N. G. F.

Permit me to call your attention further to the fact shown in your statement sent to me by the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts of bar iron purchased in the last two years, that out of all the contracts made by the Department, involving over 50 tons in any contract, that out of the eleven contracts so shown, eight of the contracts were made with this same firm, covering $120,133.13, while only three contracts in two years were given to other firms, the three contracts amounting to $15,261.45, or combining these two statements, we find that, in all, this company has furnished iron to the amount of $364,741.13, as against contracts to all other parties amounting to $15,261.45; and I am sure you will find on careful and candid investigation that this fact is solely due to the unnecessary chemical specification.

Cordage.—As to the subject of rope manufactured in the Government factory, we find that the amount of manila rope invoiced during the year (see first item, second table, page 7, Report Bureau of Equipment) was 1,697,341 pounds, costing $265,536.72, or 15⅝ cents per pound, to which 12½ per cent, at least, incidental and omitted expenses should be added.

In a letter from Mr. D. W. Ross, general purchasing officer of the Isthmian Canal Commission, under date of April 27, I note that they have paid for ordinary manila rope, 180 coils, from 10½ cents to 11 cents per pound delivered on dock at Colon. This, I understand, would not be up to the grade of best rope made in the ropewalk at the Boston yard; but I find an item in the same letter of 216,000 feet manila bolt rope, tallow laid, long fiber, smooth and hard finish, at 10¾ cents to 12¾ cents per pound delivered on dock at Colon.

As the price herein given includes not only the fixed charges incident to all manufacture, viz, cost of plant, deterioration, renewals, insurance, taxes, interest, and profits, but also delivery from the manufactory to Colon as well, and when we further consider that in figuring the cost of rope made by the Government that clerical work, work of the Pay Department, and other similar items will be found omitted in the make-up of cost, and further consider that in the item of rope the cost of material is large and the cost of labor should be relatively small, all point to the conclusion that the cost of the Government manufacture is very excessive, in fact, unreasonably so.

Now, to consider the results of this investigation. The output of material in question at Boston yard is as follows:

Anchor and chain shops, 3,408,022 pounds	$422,772.59
Add 12½ per cent for omitted material and expenses	52,846.57
Total	475,619.16
Cordage invoiced, 2,632,298 pounds	399,433.94
Add 12½ per cent for omitted material and expenses	49,929.24
Total	449,363.18

If bought in open market, quality being equal, there should be a saving of—

Anchor, chains, etc., 50 per cent	$237,809.58
Cordage, 20 per cent	89,872.63
Total	327,682.21

The foregoing sums up the facts and my estimates so far as I can at this time give them, and proceeding now to your question, what I would advise being done under such conditions as are shown, my answer would be that I would surely close one or the other or both of these manufactories as an object lesson to the other manufactories maintained by the Navy Department that the cost of the product must be kept within reasonable bounds.

[Applause.]

It is my opinion that while the hours worked under the Government are less per day than in private manufactories, and that it is universally conceded that labor is not as effective under Government management as in private institutions, nevertheless the elimination from the cost of Government output of the fixed charges heretofore mentioned, viz: cost of plant, deterioration, renewals, insurance, interest, taxes, and profits should make the conditions not far from even, and with such allowance and consideration of conditions it should not cost the Government any more to manufacture such material as we have in question than it would to buy in the open market, and if the cost can not be brought approximately equal the Government should cease to manufacture the material and buy in the open market.

I am, very sincerely, yours,

——— ———.

[Applause.]

Now, I want to say that while this may be worth looking at, and while I have mentioned the high, excessive cost, it was not my purpose in putting this material together simply to point to what it might mean in that one manufactory. What I have brought this together for is the concrete example of what it means to manufactured goods in Government institutions. I have taken this, which is, perhaps, a small item, but it appealed to me as something I knew something about. I know something about cordage; I know something about chains, as I have used them all my life in my business, and I know that I can buy in the open market the chain and the anchor and material of that kind and equal quality at one-half of what they cost in Government manufacture. Cordage can be bought at 20 per cent reduction. But this is immaterial as compared to what it might be in the great items used in the construction of these battle ships. The anchors and cables are a mere bagatelle, and while I invite your attention to this particular item I want to say that if we had business administration in the securing of supplies and the building of our ships and repairs on the ships we could save each year the cost of a battle ship to the Navy if the Department would run upon the closest business principles. And I want to say, while I honor the officer in the American Navy—a man of honor, honesty, and highest integrity—he has been educated for life upon the sea and for the handling of boats and fighting our country's battles and not to conduct business institutions.

You would not for a moment, if you wanted an officer for a battle ship, go up to the Bethlehem Steel Works and take the superintendent and put him on that ship. Then why should you take an officer of the Navy, who is trained in the academy for life upon the sea, out of that business and put him in charge of a manufacturing institution of which he absolutely knows nothing? [Applause.] I fear I have worried the committee, but I have made the fullest statement that I can upon this subject, and I sincerely hope, gentlemen, that you will permit my amendment to this bill to carry. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, can I interrogate the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LOUD. I do.

Mr. GRAHAM. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this will be a saving to the Government of over $100,000 if this amendment of his is adopted?

Mr. LOUD. Better than that, sir; far better; and this is but a little item, only the small ones, saving, as my estimate shows, $327,682.21, but when compared with the greater expenditures with which the Navy deals, this trifling matter of anchors, chains, and cordage is insignificant.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understood the gentleman to say toward the close of his remarks that it was universally conceded that the work of the mechanics in the navy-yards was not as efficient as that in the private yards.

Mr. LOUD. Do you dispute that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I just wanted to get at what the gentleman said. If I understood him correctly, I understood him that the mechanics in the navy-yards are not as efficient as the mechanics in private yards.

Mr. LOUD. Generally speaking.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will ask the gentleman if he has read the report of the Department of Commerce and Labor, made in response to the direction of the House, in which they report that the mechanics in the navy-yard now employed in building the battle ship being built in the Brooklyn yard turned out per man per hour 25.48 per cent more than the men building the battle ship at the Newport News shipbuilding yard?

Mr. LOUD. I did not read that. What first drew my attention to this subject was a visit that I made in my own time and at my own expense, visiting the navy-yards at New York, Boston, and at Portsmouth; and in that visit I went through the chain and anchor factory in the Boston Navy-Yard and saw the men wasting their time. I never saw men wasting their time as I saw them in that factory, and that was what drew my attention to that matter. I wanted to see the figures that resulted from it, and so in the next year, 1904, I found they gave some figures which gave the pound product and the cost of manufacture. I simply divided the amount and I found the cost of the output of anchor and chain shops costing 14⅜ cents per pound, on an average—double what it should be—and that indicated what I had seen myself, that the labor was being wasted in that factory.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would say to the gentleman that the Department of Commerce and Labor made the very same kind of a test between the Newport News Shipbuilding Company and the navy-yard at New York, and they report that the output of the men in the navy-yard per man per hour was 25.48 per cent more than the output in the Newport News yard.

Mr. LOUD. Figures sometimes lie. I would say to the gentleman that I have had for several years as many as 1,500 laboring men under me, and I yield to no one my judgment as to personally determining or estimating whether a laborer or body of laborers are doing reasonable or effective work or not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the mechanics in the navy-yard work eight hours a day and the mechanics in the Newport News Shipbuilding Company work nine hours a day, and, as a matter of fact, the private yard has been compelled to work their men overtime in order to keep up with the men in the navy-yards.

Mr. LOUD. I will tell you that they may work the men twelve and one-half and a great deal more to enable them to make an equal showing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman that this investigation was conducted by a Department of the Government that had no interest except to get the facts, and I believe we are entitled to rely on the Administration.

Mr. LOUD. I have not prepared myself upon that Department, and if you desire to take that up, you can do so in a speech of your own.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not want the statement to go unchallenged that it was universally conceded that there was such a difference in the work in the different plants.

Mr. OLMSTED. I will ask the gentleman if, in the estimate of 14 cents as the cost of chains to the Government in the Government yards, he has included anything for interest on the plant and for depreciation of the plant?

Mr. LOUD. I have not, or for renewals of the machinery and taxes and insurance, profits, and other things which go into every business institution.

Mr. OLMSTED. If they were added, it would make the cost still greater?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly, by that amount. [Loud applause.]

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, as this is quite an important matter, and I am satisfied that I can not answer the argument of the gentleman from Michigan within the five minutes allowed me under the rule, I ask the indulgence of the committee that I may be permitted to conclude my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that he may continue his remarks until he shall have concluded them.

Mr. VREELAND. I should like to inquire how much time the gentleman will need. It seems to me we should have some definite time fixed. We wish to give all the time that is necessary.

Mr. ROBERTS. I can not tell how long, because I have no written speech and can not tell therefore how long it will take me to say what I have in mind to say.

Mr. VREELAND. I suggest to the gentleman that he ask for some definite amount of time, and if that is not sufficient then he can ask that the time be extended.

Mr. ROBERTS. I ask that I be allowed as much time as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] occupied.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman ought to be allowed as much time as the gentleman from Michigan had.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Massachusetts is about to speak in reply to what seems to have been a well-prepared speech on the other side. It is a very important subject, and we should let him go ahead. We have more time than anything else. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I ask unanimous consent that the same time that was allotted to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] be given to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS].

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I will state that I have put a limit on my request. It is that I be allowed the same amount of time as that occupied by the gentleman from Michigan. If I can conclude sooner, I assure the gentleman from New York I will gladly do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts that he be permitted to continue for the same length of time as the gentleman from Michigan who spoke in favor of the amendment?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I desire to say that I was very much interested in the argument of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD]. While the matter has been gone over quite minutely in the committee, yet he has extended it considerably, and I was forcibly impressed by one statement made by him early in the course of his remarks. He told us that Admiral Manney, who was Chief of the Bureau of Equipment of the Navy Department at the time he was before the Naval Committee and made his statement, was an interested witness, and for that reason we should not give the statements of Admiral Manney the same amount of credence that we would give to those of a disinterested witness. That struck me as a very remarkable statement, that Admiral Manney, a man of the highest honor and integrity and efficiency, who was about to retire from the Navy by reason of age, was an interested witness before a great committee of this House. I hardly think many of the Members here will take that statement seriously or that they will attribute ulterior and sinister motives and purposes to the testimony of Admiral Manney. But when we come to the question of interest, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] at great length gives this committee information that he has obtained, from whom? From people in this country engaged in the manufacture of articles which they would like to supply to the Navy Department.

Now, on the question of the interest of the witnesses on both sides of this question, I leave it to the Members of this House whether the private manufacturers, who want to supply these hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of material to the Navy Department, are disinterested in their statements.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I should like to ask the gentleman a question for my own information on the question of interest. My understanding is that there is a great shortage of officers for sea duty in the Navy. Will the gentleman kindly, in the course of his remarks—not necessarily right now, but before he concludes—inform the House about how many commissioned naval officers there are in the various navy-yards of the United States, technically on shore duty, but actually engaged in manufacturing operations for the various departments of the Navy?

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I am not able to give the gentleman the information as to how many.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. About how many?

Mr. ROBERTS. I am not even able to tell about how many of these officers are stationed in navy-yards; but I want to say to the gentleman that if these officers were not in the navy-yards superintending the manufacture of these things used by the Navy Department they would be at the private plants of the private manufacturers inspecting those articles made outside of the navy-yards. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. At the expense of the Government.

Mr. ROBERTS. So there would be nothing saved in that. All articles manufactured in any quantity in private establishments are manufactured under the immediate inspection and supervision of naval officers, taken from sea duty for that purpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROBERTS. I will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Are the constructors of the Navy educated to go to sea?

Mr. ROBERTS. They are not educated to go to sea; they are educated to remain on shore.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Is it not a fact that last year one officer of the Government supervised and attended to the inspection of all three of the large manufacturing concerns for the Government? And that, of course, would have been impossible if they had been in charge of the actual process of manufacturing. I am asking these questions for information, for I know nothing about it.

Mr. ROBERTS. That may be; if there had been enough inspectors there would have been one in charge of each establishment, if the output had been sufficient to warrant it. But, Mr. Chairman, this is entirely aside from the subject we have under discussion.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROBERTS. The gentleman from Michigan declined to yield to me, but I will gladly yield to him. I would like to say that if these interruptions are to come out of my time I wish gentlemen would be brief and not occupy too much time.

Mr. LOUD. I want to say that I made no allusion or insinuation against the honesty or integrity of Admiral Manney, for I believe him to be far above anything of that sort. I do think, however, that his information was not correct when he says that the cost of a battle ship's cable, two and three quarters, was 9½ cents, and the next size, only one-eighth of an inch difference, cost 13⅛ cents a pound.

Mr. ROBERTS. Oh, I did not yield to the gentleman to continue his speech. I thought he wanted to ask me a question and not continue the remarks he began some time ago. I did not say that the gentleman imputed to Admiral Manney the full force and effect of his words. I do not think he realized the full force and effect of them, but if my ears did not deceive me he made a flat-footed statement that Admiral Manney was an interested witness.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The gentleman from Massachusetts left the impression on my mind that the private contractors were interested parties in a sinister way; that is, that they would have one set of books to sell by and another to bid by.

Mr. ROBERTS. Oh, no. I said in opposition to what was said by the gentleman from Michigan that if there was interest anywhere in the statements made on either side of the question it was just as likely, and more probable, that the private manufacturers had a greater interest in securing these Government contracts than had the head of one of the great bureaus in having the work done at the navy-yard. There was no sinister motive, no willful and deliberate misstatement of facts, perhaps, but the whole trend and tenor of the letters and communications was to create in the minds of Members of Congress the idea that the Government was paying more for articles than these same articles could be obtained for in the commercial walks of life, and that the Government should go out among the private manufacturers and purchase these articles.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I am glad to have the gentleman from Massachusetts correct the impression on my mind and, I fear, the impression that was made on others, that the private contractors were not honest in their statements.

Mr. ROBERTS. I did not want to convey the idea that they are dishonest in those statements, but I still insist that, in my judgment, these private manufacturers are interested witnesses, and they put as favorable a phase on their statements as the facts will warrant.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has not Admiral Manney been recently retired?

Mr. ROBERTS. I was about to finish that statement.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has he not shown himself a hero on several particular occasions?

Mr. ROBERTS. Oh, the record of Admiral Manney is one of the finest. I want to say to the members of the committee that since Admiral Manney appeared before the House Committee on Naval Affairs and gave his testimony in regard to the operations of this Bureau he has been retired for age, and we now have another gentleman at the head of the Bureau.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. ROBERTS. I will.

Mr. LOUD. Did not the gentleman notice that the letters I quoted from were nearly all of them from those who bought chains, from those who are consumers and not sellers?

Mr. ROBERTS. No; I did not notice that they were all from consumers. I noticed that some of them were from manufacturers, and unquestionably many of those consumers represented the manufacturers.

Mr. LOUD. Not a single manufacturer; they were all consumers.

Mr. McNARY. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. ROBERTS. I will; for a question.

Mr. McNARY. In reference to the question asked by the gentleman from Connecticut in regard to the detail of men for the navy-yard, I would like to ask the gentleman whether it is not a fact that the English navy, which is the superior navy of the world, not only manufactures these things specified here, but ships, powder, shot, guns, and everything else under the inspection of a naval official? And is it not regarded as the proper thing for the naval officers to be instructed in the highest possible way, to the highest point of perfection, and to oversee the manufacture of these articles in the Government yard?

Mr. ROBERTS. I so understand that, Mr. Chairman. I understand it is the policy of the English Government to keep a considerable proportion of its new construction under construction in its own navy-yards, and to make nearly everything that it requires for its military equipment in those yards under the immediate supervision of its own officers; and I want to say on that point, although it is somewhat of a digression, that our own Navy Department has insisted before the Committee on Naval Affairs time and again, even in the short time in which I have been a member, that it is absolutely necessary for the proper equipping of an officer to discharge his duties afloat on the ships that he understand fully all the details of the manufacture of everything that goes into the make-up of that ship when he goes on her decks, and that is one of the strong reasons why the Navy Department has always insisted that the education of a Navy officer would not be complete if he were kept at sea all the time and were not allowed to have information and understand how all the different things that enter into the make-up of a battle ship are constructed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, upon the showing made here, is it not a rather expensive tuition?

Mr. ROBERTS. Oh, I am coming to that point, of the showing made here. I was just going to take that point up when the gentleman brought it to my attention.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me? The gentleman does not wish to make any statements that are not correct.

Mr. ROBERTS. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am told by authority that I think is unquestionable that substantially all the chain made for the British navy is being made by private contractors.

Mr. ROBERTS. I take the gentleman's statement for it. I did not mean to say that in that particular instance the English Government made its own chains. I think they make a large proportion, but, generally speaking, the English Government manufactures much more extensively in its yards than does our Government.

Now, in regard to the cost of these articles that have been under discussion, the gentleman from Michigan, as near as I could follow his remarks, took as his basis the figures given him by the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment, being the cost per pound, and then to get at the true cost he says we must figure in the cost of the plant and the cost of the machinery and all those items, and in that way he built up the cost of the Government-made anchor chains, anchors, and cordage, and so on, away beyond the figures given us by Admiral Manney. Has the gentleman thought of and have the members of this committee for a moment considered this aspect, that if you buy all of these things from private manufacturers you must still add to the cost you pay to the private manufacturer substantially all the items named by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] because we have the money invested in the plants? There is the interest item, and we have got to keep the plants up whether we use them or not. That is a cost to the Government. It is just as much a cost to the Government if we buy the product outside as it is a cost to the Government if they are manufactured in those shops, so that that item goes into the question of cost whether the Government manufactures or does not manufacture. There is no escaping that conclusion. That argument of the gentleman makes a bad showing for the Department on this item of cost, but there are certain fixed, standing items of expense, if you are going to reckon them into the cost price, that must go on whether the plants are open or closed up.

There is another feature of the gentleman's statement to which I wish to call attention. I asked the gentleman a question, not to interrupt the flow of his speech or to disarrange the train of his ideas, but for information. He was telling us about the comparative cost of the half-inch and the three-quarter-inch chains. Now, it is my understanding, and if I am wrong I hope the gentleman will correct me, that these half-inch, three-quarter-inch, and all small-sized chains that are bought in the open market are machine-made chains.

Mr. LOUD. No; the gentleman is entirely wrong.

Mr. ROBERTS. Then the gentleman's comparison was of hand-made chains?

Mr. LOUD. Entirely so.

Mr. ROBERTS. Then I am wrong in respect to that; but the figures given us and the statements made by Admiral Manney are that they do not get the same quality of chain in the open market that they make in the Government yards. There is no question about that. Then when the gentleman came to take up the larger sized chains, he spoke of the breaking strain, the standard established by the Government. I do not think he went into that quite sufficiently to give the committee full information about it. It has been the policy of the Navy Department to make all of these cable chains in its own shops, but, owing to the rapid increase in the number of ships and the great demand for these cables, Admiral Manney told us that a year or so ago the Department found itself short some 11 miles of this cable, and it was impossible with the facilities at hand to catch up; so the Department was compelled to go out into the open market and try to get a chain there that was the equal of the chain they were making, and what was the result? Why, Admiral Manney told us that time and time again in his testimony. They could not find a manufacturer in the United States that was making a cable chain in the manner in which it was being made in the navy-yard. Why? All the outside manufacturers were making what is called the "side weld." When they lapped the iron over to make a link, the weld came on the side, and when the strain comes on the ends, that side-welded link is weaker than the end weld, because when the end weld is made you carry into effect substantially what is known in marine parlance as the "sister-hook idea."

The two ends of the link are lapped in this fashion [illustrating], so that the strain comes on both parts, and there is no possibility of pulling the link open; but with the side weld that possibility always exists.

Mr. LOUD. Do you not know that the last six battle-ship cables, which are being made by the Monongahela Iron and Steel Company, are all side weld?

Mr. ROBERTS. I understand they are all side weld——

Mr. LOUD. I meant to say end weld.

Mr. ROBERTS. And the Admiral stated they have succeeded in getting one concern in the country to undertake the making of the end weld, but none of that chain has been delivered yet, and we do not know whether it is going to be a satisfactory chain or not. It has not been tested. Now, to go a little bit further in regard to this heavy cable chain. Admiral Manney tells us that the quality of the iron put into the commercial cable is not as high as that of the Government chain. It is not as good; it is a softer iron; and it will wear faster than the Government-made chain; it will rust out faster than the Government-made chain, and those two things are an important factor in the life of the cable.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. Are you not aware all the cables used in the English navy are side weld?

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether they are side weld, and I do not care whether they are side weld or not. The Navy Department of this country after full investigation has, with the idea of safeguarding the millions of dollars that are floating in the battle ships and the hundreds of lives there, established a standard superior to the commercial chains or the chains of the English navy, and I do not believe—while the whole tenor of the gentleman's argument was to a lowering of the standard of the United States Navy for its supplies—in it. I believe in keeping that standard just where it is, the very best of any country in the world.

Mr. LOUD. So do I.

Mr. ROBERTS. But your whole argument was on that line.

Mr. LOUD. Not at all.

Mr. ROBERTS. Your argument was to buy this cheap commercial stuff, because you could get it for less money. Now I am coming to another phase of the gentleman's argument. He spoke about cables that have been furnished for some of these big steamers on the Pacific coast—3¼ inches; I will not be exact, but the links are much larger than any cable we use in the Navy. Admiral Manney went into that feature in his hearing and he says that the cable 3¼ inches, if that is the size—it was over 3 inches—in his judgment, is not as strong as the 2¾-inch cable we are making in our own navy-yards. That is not the whole measure of the undesirability of the commercial cable. The weight of it is a very important factor in battle ships. Admiral Manney says:

> There are other points about the chain cables. The Boston chain, as I said, is of the highest-grade iron; it is better iron than is put in commercial chains. Much of the latter is unsuitable. Such chains are unduly heavy and liable to accident. The cables of the Pacific liners of which I spoke are, I believe, the largest ever made in this country—3 7/16 inches; cost, $0.543 per pound. There is no machine in the United States that can test that cable for strength if it is of the best cable iron. It is safe to say that it has never been tested. These chains would not meet the Navy Department specifications. The increase of weight above that of the largest navy cable is for two cables 34,000 pounds (17 tons), which would have to be paid for at whatever the price per pound might be.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him there?

Mr. ROBERTS. If the gentleman will permit me to read the paragraph I will.

> Such weight is objectionable in a battle ship, because, as she carries from three to four cables, the unnecessary weight would bar out from 25½ to 34 tons of armor, ammunition, or coal.

There is an item that has got to be considered in the equipment of a battle ship. Are you going to get a cheap commercial cable because it is cheap?

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. ROBERTS. Go ahead.

Mr. LOUD. If your battle ship is twice as large as the battle ships you are using now, will you have a larger chain? These western steamers I am talking about are double the size of the battle ships we are using.

Mr. ROBERTS. When we increase the size of our battle ships, we may increase the size of the chains. That is a matter for the technical authorities of the Navy to determine, but all the evidence we have before us to-day is that the largest cable we are now making is strong enough or heavy enough for any of the battle ships that we now have, and it will be a technical error to put onto those battle ships commercial chain weighing, as I have shown you here, something like 34,000 pounds more than that which we now have, because you have got to take out just that much weight in something else—your armament, your ammunition, your supplies, your coal, or whatever it may be.

Mr. LOUD. May I suggest to the gentleman that these ships for which these chains were intended are double the size and that the battle ships now must have larger chains?

Mr. ROBERTS. That is no argument, it strikes me, in regard to this proposition—not the slightest. We are considering the efficiency of the chain. The gentleman stated not long ago in the course of his argument, if I gathered the full effect of it, that we can go into the market and buy all of the things that had been under discussion—our rope, our cable, and our anchors—much cheaper than we can make them. I want the committee to consider for just a moment what the possible, and I leave it to your judgment, if it is not the probable, effect of his amendment would be, should it pass. He has provided that no part of said sum shall be expended in the manufacture in any Government navy-yard of any article that can be obtained in the open market at less than the cost of manufacture in said navy-yard. What does that mean? Taking the idea, as I gather it, it fixes the cost of certain articles to that of manufacture in a Government yard. Does anybody believe for a moment that a private manufacturer is going to furnish the Government something that it wants and must have at a less price than the Government sets on that article? The whole effect of the gentleman's amendment, should it become law, would be to raise the price to the Government of all these supplies in the open market and could have no other effect. I notice that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] smiles at that remark.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will allow me, I smile for this reason: I never heard before that creating competition increased prices.

Mr. ROBERTS. I am very glad the gentleman brought that up, because it shows his unfamiliarity with the whole subject. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] has provided in this amendment that the open market govern the purchase and the price. I do not know, but I presume the gentleman from Michigan knows—I do not know that he does, however—that in the Navy Department "open market" has a peculiar significance. Open-market purchases in the Navy Department mean purchase without competition. It means that the proper officer goes into the market and buys wherever he sees fit, without any bid, proposal, or without any competition whatever, and that is one of the effects of the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD].

Mr. GROSVENOR. The word "open" is not in the amendment.

Mr. ROBERTS. I had the amendment right from the desk there, and the word "open" is in it, if the gentleman will pardon me.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It says in the "free" market.

Mr. ROBERTS. Oh, but the amendment as written up there at the desk is the one that we are considering—not something that appears in the RECORD. What we have before the House is the written amendment presented by the gentleman from Michigan. But I am willing to take that construction. What does a "free" market mean but an "open" market? How can you construe it as anything but that you are authorizing the Navy Department to go into a free market and purchase?

Mr. GROSVENOR. He has a free market to-day; and if he wanted to buy a hundred head of horses, would he be compelled to go and find the horses, or would he advertise for competition?

Mr. ROBERTS. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] earlier in this debate found fault with the procedure of the Navy Department in purchasing the material from which chains and ropes and anchors were manufactured, because he said the Department favored certain manufacturers.

They now get open and free competition as to materials to be furnished by his amendment which was accepted. Now, is there any reason why there will not be the same condition of affairs if the Department goes into the open market? They know what an open market means up there. They want an open market, opened as broadly as possible, so that they will not be hampered by asking for bids, proposals, specifications, and all the rigamarole and red tape of making Government contracts as now exist.

Mr. KELIHER. Will my colleague allow me to ask how long, in his opinion, he thinks it would be, if the Government were to go into the open market and buy from concerns with a capacity to furnish the Government, before there would be a combination to fix prices and that they would soar up as in other cases—notably, for instance, in the matter of powder, that we discovered when the Army bill was up for consideration?

Mr. ROBERTS. I thank my colleague for bringing that matter to my attention. It was one that I proposed to refer to in the course of my remarks. That is one of the probable and almost inevitable results of the adoption of this amendment. If you by this amendment fix the price of the manufacture, and it will be fixed at the cost of the manufacture in the Government navy-yards, inevitably, as business is conducted throughout the country, it would produce not a trust, perhaps, not a combination, but a "gentleman's agreement," possibly, as to the prices that should be charged the Government for what it wants.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KNOWLAND. You are a member of the Naval Committee, are you not?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KNOWLAND. This matter was fully discussed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, was it not?

Mr. ROBERTS. I will state to the gentleman that the cost of production was thoroughly gone into before the committee—thoroughly discussed—but there was no motion made in the committee to prevent the Government from manufacturing in its own yards any of these articles, and this proposition as it appears on the floor was not discussed in the committee.

Mr. KNOWLAND. In other words, the matter of the cost of chain was thoroughly gone into in the committee, and the committee saw fit to make no recommendation after a full hearing.

Mr. ROBERTS. Oh, yes; as I have read from Admiral Manney's hearing, and as other gentlemen will later read, you will see that nearly every possible phase was carefully and extensively and exhaustively gone into. On the matter of these chains, particularly the heavy cables, Admiral Manney went into minutiæ. He says the chains made in the commercial world are not finished as well as the chains made in the Government yards. They are rough, and all that. They are of rough workmanship, and they will wear fast as they go in and out of the hawser holes. They are not as carefully made as the chains made in the navy-yards. And the life of a commercial chain, taking everything else, quality and breaking strain, and all that—the life of the chain would not be as great as the life of a navy-made chain.

Mr. KNOWLAND. What I wanted to get at is, that the committee has had the matter before them, and after hearing the testimony of Admiral Manney and discussing the matter among themselves, they did not see fit to change existing conditions.

Mr. ROBERTS. The gentleman has the correct idea of it. The committee considered all of these different things, and nobody made any motion to do anything different from what we have been doing all along. The committee did not consider there was any necessity for making any change; so that this matter, as it appears on the floor, is entirely new to the members of the committee as a committee.

Just one other thing that possibly I did not go into as exhaustively as I might, and that is the breaking strain of these chains. I will refer to it a little. Admiral Manney told the committee that in order to get the private manufacturers to make these cables at all the Government had to lower its standard, and, among other things, the breaking strain. Now, he says in regard to that—the breaking strain of the cable—the cable would just come within that limit; but he says the breaking strain of the navy-yard cable is much greater than the commercial-made cable. There is an item or element in that proposition that perhaps members of this committee should consider. While the private-made article may just barely get by the Government requirement, do you want to take it when you have a Government-made article that far exceeds the requirement? I think any reasonable man would take the superior article every time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman please inform the committee what paraphernalia is made at our Government yards that is now in question here? Give us the items, so that we will know what we are dealing with.

Mr. ROBERTS. That is another phase of the gentleman's amendment. As I understood him when he began he was aiming at the manufacture of cordage, both hemp and wire, and chains, cables, and anchors; but the amendment as he now has it is broadened out away beyond those limits, so that you can not manufacture anything under the Bureau of Equipment in any navy-yard in this country if that same article can be purchased outside for less money.

Now, what do we manufacture under equipment in the navy-yards? In the Boston yard we manufacture cordage, both hemp and wire, and cables and anchors, and that is the only place where we do manufacture them; but we have sail lofts in all the navy-yards, where the sails and the hammocks and all those things that are needed by the men in the Navy are manufactured. That is done in all the navy-yards of the country. Then in the New York yard we have a clothing manufactory, where they make the uniforms for the enlisted men. That would come within the sweeping prohibition of this clause. And there are many things. I can not recall at the moment all the things that are manufactured under the Bureau of Equipment in the different yards.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This motion covers any article that is necessary to be used.

Mr. ROBERTS. That is exactly the idea I am trying to convey. This amendment started out as a blow at the Boston Navy-Yard, but it has been extended so it is a blow at every navy-yard in the country where there is any equipment manufacturing going on.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, will the gentleman tell us what the price of the particular matter here in question was before the Government began to make it in the navy-yards?

Mr. ROBERTS. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I can not give the gentleman that information, because I have not gone into that detail of it. I should think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] might possibly inform the gentleman from Tennessee on that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I asked him, and he could not tell. I think it is a very important proposition.

Mr. ROBERTS. There is one great trouble in all the comparisons made by the gentleman from Michigan, and that is in the absolute difference in the premises. You might just as well try to compare a bluebird with a crow. They are both birds, but there the points of similarity end. So it is with these things manufactured for the Government by the Bureau of Equipment. They are chains and anchors and wire rope and hemp rope and those things, having the same names as similar articles manufactured outside, but those manufactured in the Navy Department are superior in every respect to anything they can get outside. The testimony has not been disputed that when the Government went outside to get that heavy cable, of which it could not manufacture enough to keep up with the needs of the service, the Government had to lower its standards—had to accept an inferior article—in order to get any that would come anywhere near meeting the requirements of the situation. And so, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that one fact ought to be conclusive on this question.

But here is another phase of the situation that I would like to present to the committee and then I will close. If this amendment becomes a law and operates as the gentleman thinks it will, it will have only one effect, and that is to close up the Government factories manufacturing these different things. When those factories are closed up, then the Government loses its only means of keeping down the price of these articles. It loses its only means of protecting itself from extortionate prices. What will be the inevitable result? The manufacturers will put up their prices and they will keep putting up those prices, because the Government must have these things, and when that price goes up to the point where the Government can manufacture, then, under this law, the Government could rehabilitate its plant and could reach out into the industrial world and possibly get back the force of skilled men it had been employing and start again to manufacture these articles; but when it did that private enterprise would immediately drop the price of the article a trifle below the cost of the manufacture by the Government, and the Government would have to go out of business again, and so you would have that seesaw eternally and nothing conclusive. The Government would be paying as much and, I think, in the end, more than it pays now, because Admiral Manney told us repeatedly that, considering the quality, the Navy Department manufactures more cheaply than private manufacturers. And quality is the one thing we should keep our eye on when we are fitting out these great battle ships.

We want the best possible material that can be had; we do not want anything inferior, no matter if the people will give it to us, because in the end it is false economy. The few dollars that might be saved by buying commercial articles, articles upon which the safety of millions of dollars depend, would be the poorest kind of economy if, through weakness or defect in that inferior article, a costly battle ship was lost with hundreds of lives. It would be the poorest kind of economy.

Another feature of this case also: They tell us about the size of cables used by commercial vessels. Now, it is well understood by those familiar with naval affairs, and I think it must be apparent to anybody whether he knows anything about the sea or not, that a naval vessel hoists and lowers its anchors twenty-five times where the commercial ship drops an anchor once. And then the naval vessel is sailing the sea in all waters of the world, anchoring, as she must do, on all kinds of bottoms. She must have the very best appliances to insure the safety of the ship.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentleman, I have gone into this matter and have taken more time than I intended, but the Chief of the Bureau of Experiment, and, if I were permitted to quote, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy are opposed to any amendment of this sort, and it seems to me an unwise thing for this House to lower, deliberately lower, the standard of the materials to be used in our Navy, as will be done with such an amendment.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROBERTS. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. The gentleman speaks of the Navy Department being obliged to lower the standard of various goods manufactured of this character for use in building and equipping ships in order to secure them from the outside manufacturer. Does that account for the fact that the Government itself keeps up this high standard and for the fact of the difference in cost as shown by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD]?

Mr. ROBERTS. I will state that that accounts in part for the increase in cost. I am glad the gentleman from New York brought this up.

Mr. GOULDEN. There is quite a noticeable difference in the cost, as shown by the figures of the gentleman from Michigan, and I wanted to satisfy myself whether the lowering of the standard by the Department to the open shops brought about the difference of price mentioned by the gentleman.

Mr. ROBERTS. I want to show the gentleman just how much the lowering of the standard lowered the cost to the Government. Admiral Manney testified that the large cable now being made cost 9½ cents per pound. By lowering the standard and allowing a private concern to make a side weld instead of an end weld they saved one-quarter of a cent a pound. That was all of the saving to the Government by abandoning its standard, and the only reason it abandoned the standard was because of the great demand for cable and the inadequate facilities of the Government to make all it needed. They were not able to manufacture all they wanted. So you can see that when the Government for these reasons is compelled to go outside it will get an inferior article, and it is going to cost almost identically what the Government now pays for a superior article. It is a business proposition for each man to settle whether that is economy, whether that is a part of wisdom to drop the standard because you save a fraction of a cent a pound.

Mr. RIXEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS. I will.

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to ask the gentleman this question. We are both on the Committee on Naval Affairs. I want to ask him if he concedes the contention of the gentleman from Michigan, that the chains which are made by the Boston Navy-Yard can be purchased any cheaper in the open market?

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I do not concede that for a moment. I did not even hear the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] make the statement that chains of the same quality as those made in the navy-yard at Boston can be purchased outside at any price. What the gentleman from Michigan did say was that cables of this diameter could be purchased in the open market at a less price than it cost us to make it, but he very carefully refrained from saying that it was cable just as good as that which was made at the navy-yard.

Mr. RIXEY. Is not the only fair comparison a comparison as to quality and whether they can come up to the specifications required by the Navy Department?

Mr. ROBERTS. Most assuredly, and that has been my attempt, throughout my argument, to demonstrate that we should keep up the quality. We should insist on the very highest standard and we should maintain that standard, and the cost over and above what the article could be bought for in the market is infinitesimal.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the debate on this question. This thought has occurred to me, and I think possibly the suggestion has been made heretofore, when we had up the question of the Government powder factory in the Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Congresses. In April, 1900, Secretary Long reported to Congress that he needed—I think this is the substance of his report—more competition and better powder—smokeless powder. Congress at once made an appropriation to build a powder factory, and later on Secretary Long reports to Congress in these words:

> The powder factory at Indianhead is progressing favorably. It is neither expected nor desired to enter into competition at this work with private manufacturers, except as to quality.

"Quality" in hardware is the very point that has been here to-day accentuated, particularly by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS], and that regardless of the cost price we are getting exactly what the Government needs in its Navy Department and a better "quality" than we can get from any private concern, and if I understood the gentleman from Massachusets correctly he said a few moments ago we are getting at the navy-yard an article that we can not get at private sale at all.

Mr. ROBERTS. That is the fact exactly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. So it will be seen that we are not only getting a better quality of article which is indispensable, but we are getting an article that we could not get at all under private contract.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Oh, we are getting just the same article.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Massachusetts disagrees with the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I can not help it if he does. That is his privilege.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, I stand by my friend from Massachusetts, because I asked him the question and he answered it. I do not want to disagree with the gentleman from Connecticut. I want to say this, as Secretary Long says about the question of powder, that we will, as he did, get a better quality if the Government makes it. Then there is another proposition. Suppose we have to pay a little more, if the Government makes it, and you can get the same article on the outside.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. But this amendment has nothing to do with powder, has it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, I am using that by way of analogy to show you exactly what has been done with powder. The principle is the same. We did not get the quality of powder we desired, and we did not get the amount and the price was exorbitant, because of a lack of "sufficient competition," as Secretary Long said about powder. This is why we put up that powder factory, and we need to enlarge it now. Suppose you were to close down making any public machinery in any of our Government factories of any kind, does the gentleman not know that the private factories would rise up and fleece the people and the Government?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. No; I do not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh yes; that is the experience of the United States before.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Oh, there is a large number of factories that make chains.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes, and about all are in a trust. They not only make chains, but they have got chains around the hands and the feet of the American people, including Uncle Sam. There is nothing but seed and air now which is not in a trust.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the Lebanon Chain Works, which makes these chains, is in my district and that it is not in a trust, but is opposed to every trust, and is doing an exceedingly good business.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then I hope my friend will vote for free alcohol, and then we will preserve that factory until Gabriel blows his trumpet. [Laughter.] I congratulate the country that there is something in the gentleman's State that is not in a trust. But my point is this, that if we stop making these articles we make in our Government factories—pistols, guns, powder, harness, military clothes, brass buttons, and the various things that we make—common sense would say that the manufacturers would put up the price on the Government of the United States as well as upon the people. Now, I think it is the height of wisdom—it is good common sense, it is a business proposition—that we continue to make a part of these articles and all others in Government factories.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is said that the manufacturers of the country are prospering as never before in the history of the world, but Uncle Sam is not, because we have had a deficit in the Treasury for about eighteen months. I would like to know who is nearer the pauper row, the manufacturers of the country or the Treasury of the United States? Isn't it our duty to keep up a healthy competition? And certainly we are doing it now. The Navy is hurting no one. Admiral Manney, a man of integrity, a man of splendid record, now retired, totally disinterested, having nothing privately on earth to do with this, has stated that we are getting exactly the article that we want, as I remember the testimony, and that we are getting an article that at the time he wanted it was not made by private citizens at all.

Now, let me go a step further. Admiral O'Neil—I am reading from one of my speeches, where I quoted from Admiral O'Neil (Secretary's Report, 1897, p. 295)—who then said:

> The Bureau is of opinion that, for national and economic reasons, the Department should own and operate a smokeless-powder factory, at which it could produce a part of the powder required for the naval service, and an item has been inserted in the annual estimates for this purpose. The property known as Bellevue Magazine, on the Potomac, just below Washington, would be an excellent site, and it is conveniently reached by water and by railroad, and it is but two hours' distance from the naval proving ground. The present price of the smokeless powder procured by purchase is very high, and the Bureau believes it can produce it in larger quantities at a greatly reduced price.

And if I understood the statement of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY], we are now doing that. Going on, he states:

> The success of the Bureau with its gun factory encourages it to believe that it would do equally well in the manufacture of other munitions of war.

President Lincoln recommended Government factories. We not only get a better quality, but get exactly what we want; and we have competition, we have it right now, and are about to stifle it by this change. Why, the proposition the gentleman [Mr. LOUD] makes shows that we have competition now; let us continue it; not that the Government wants to go into the manufacture of anything to sell it to its people, but to supply public wants—take care of itself.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Do I understand the gentleman to assert that there is no fair competition now in the Government supplies, such as steel and iron?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why, I do not think so.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. You do not think there is fair competition?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, well, I mean between manufacturers as such. Between the Government, in making these articles, and steel concerns there is competition.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. There are some bids, if you will let me read them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Anything to enlighten the subject.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. And they run from two and three hundredths of a cent per pound up to 5½ cents. There are eight companies that bid on those, and if the gentleman will allow me I will read. The Bethlehem Steel Company's bid was 2.75.

Mr. ROBERTS. What is the gentleman talking about?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Bar steel: Berry & Aikens Company, 2.60; Carpenter Steel Company, 3.20; Crucible Steel Company, 2.20; J. B. Kendal, 2.03; they were the lowest bidders; Midvale Company, 5.50; Sanson & Roland, 3.16.

Mr. ROBERTS. To whom were these bids submitted?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. To the Navy Department.

Mr. ROBERTS. What is the date of that?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. March 6. There are a large number of other bids, ranging from 1.91 to 3.75. Here are thirteen bidders.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who are the concerns that are bidding?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. The Bethlehem Company, Berry & Aikens, Carpenter Steel Company, the Carnegie Company, the Crucible Steel Company, I. G. Johnson, J. B. Kendal, the Midvale Company; Manning, Max & Moore; New Jersey Foundry and Machine Company; Edward A. Temple; Woodward, Wite & Co.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, will the gentleman tell the House how many of these concerns are controlled by one great big trust?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. With such prices it would be utterly——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand you have named companies all over the country; but is there not a main company in control of the whole business by having directors in all the subsidiary companies?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Let me have three minutes more. I have not finished what I have to say, and my friends have interrupted me so much.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. The bids would hardly vary.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Wait a minute. Let me finish up. The gentleman can get five minutes. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LILLEY], I dare say——

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I just wanted to show you there was plenty of competition, and that there was no agreement as to prices.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Connecticut, I dare say, will not be able to tell this House that all the companies whose bids he has read there are not controlled by one company.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. The very figures show that they are not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I say that the Federal steel concern—I believe that is what it is called—or the steel trust, controls from 60 to 80 per cent of the output of steel in the United States.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. What difference does it make to the Government, if the Government buys it cheaply, if they are all owned by one man? Here is a wide range of difference in the bids.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If we did not keep up this factory, my dear sir, past history has shown, and my judgment compels me to believe, that these private companies would raise the price. Foreign governments, in the building of their war machinery, give part of the work to the private concerns and part of the work to the public, or government, factories. In that way they maintain and run both. So that if the private factories were to burn down, or if they were to be sold to the enemy, we would have Government factories, with lamps trimmed and burning, making paraphernalia not only in time of peace, but they would be in perfect condition in time of war. Now, all the great nations of the world give part of the work to private factories for the purpose of maintaining them, which is right and proper, and give the other part to the government factories for the purpose of keeping them in running order and serving the government in time of both war and peace. I investigated that matter in the Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Congresses. I wrote letters to the representatives of foreign governments here, and that is the substance of the letters which they wrote back to me and which I published in the RECORD. Hence I shall oppose the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan. Suppose the Government gets all the articles we want from private concerns; that would close up the Government factories and stop their machinery. We would lose our best artisans, our fine labor, everything would be thrown into chaos, and inside of six months you would see the prices of all these articles, if we are to judge the future by the past, raised to exorbitant, oppressive, and monopolistic prices.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, this amendment stands in the RECORD as offered by myself. I think I ought to say to the committee that I was not the author of the amendment. It was drawn by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], and I undertook to offer it in the name of and in behalf of my friend from Michigan [Mr. LOUD].

But that makes no difference in the merits of the case. I have no navy-yard in my district, and hence I am a distinterested witness. I have no doubt if I had one that I should be as zealous to upbuild the number of employees as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] seems to be. And I do not blame him for that. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], however, has no navy-yard. He has been drawn into the toils of discussion here by the gentleman representing our navy-yards, and I want to remind him that he has got no navy-yard in his district——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Hence I am partial to recognizing Uncle Sam.

Mr. GROSVENOR (continuing). And has a great lot of labor that ought not to be driven out of the greatest industries in the country by any act of Congress. The matter is not of importance to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Now, I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS], and I am satisfied that the amendment which I nominally offered is not in the form it ought to be, and the suggestions have come to me from the gentleman from Massachusetts, in his address, and I concede that upon two points, probably, there is wisdom in his suggestion, and I am glad to testify to it; and, at the proper time, I will offer two amendments to the amendment, the first one to follow the word "article," in the second line, as it is printed in the RECORD. And I want to remind my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] that the word "open," before the word "market," does not appear in the amendment that is pending before the House.

Mr. ROBERTS. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. ROBERTS. The reading clerk read the amendment from the paper he had before him, which contained the words "open market." He showed me the writing, and I read it "open market" just as he did.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is printed in the RECORD——

Mr. ROBERTS. The gentleman knows that we do not go by what is printed in the RECORD. We go by written papers, that are in the hands of the Clerk, offered from the floor. I have heard the gentleman before get up and correct the RECORD because it was inaccurate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I never saw the amendment until the gentleman sent it up by page. Now, will the Clerk send me that amendment? Now, is there anybody who will make it say that? You may poll this whole committee and there will be as many say "free" as there will say "open."

Mr. ROBERTS. Whose handwriting is that?

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is no "p" in it. It really does not say anything. It is not a word; it is a sign; but, as it is printed and as it will be voted upon, it is a "free market." But I am going to cure all that trouble, so that gentlemen will be relieved; and I shall offer this amendment to the pending amendment as it appears in the RECORD. After the word "article," in the second line, as it stands printed, I will offer this:

By bids at the solicitation of the Department, or in such other manner as the Department chooses.

Now, then, there is no squeezing out of anybody in that language. That gives the Navy Department the fullest possible opportunity to buy as best they can, either by soliciting bids or by going out and finding the article in any other way.

Mr. ROBERTS. If the gentleman will pardon me.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In the last line of the amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the Chair will be a little patient, as I want to get this right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I propose to offer a second amendment, as follows:

Of a standard of quality to be fixed by the Navy Department.

Mr. ROBERTS. Will the gentleman pardon me just a moment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, yes.

Mr. ROBERTS. I understood the gentleman to say that he was trying to obviate the objection pointed out by me to the use of the words "open market." Am I correct in that?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; I do not care anything about that. My attention was called to this defect——

Mr. ROBERTS. I am rather surprised that the gentleman should take up so much time in correcting a defect, if it was one, that had not been pointed out.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will take a great deal of pains to say to the gentleman, and he may send it home by special telegram if he chooses, that my attention was called to the defect in the amendment drawn by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the matter was shown by the learning and eloquence of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ROBERTS. I thank the gentleman. Nobody is better qualified to distinguish those qualities than the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can distinguish it, and now express it.

Mr. ROBERTS. The gentleman should not be surprised that I should agree with him.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, the amendment which I propose to offer I think gets rid of two objections which I have said I recognize as made by the gentleman from Massachusetts. First, that there may be a construction put upon the words "free market" that would limit the jurisdiction or the operation of the Navy Department in its purchases, and, second, the amendment as proposed is that the Navy Department if it solicits bids or contracts with any contractor for any of the articles shall fix the standard itself that the articles shall come up to. And then we have what? We have the competition of the whole United States in competition with this Bureau of the Navy Department, which is expending such enormous sums of money that, in my judgment, justify Congress in giving some attention to it. Certainly no harm can come to the Navy Department. They shall not be permitted to buy a chain that does not come up to their own standard of fitness; they shall not be compelled to buy an anchor that does not come up to their own standard of fitness, and they shall not be compelled to buy an article that does not correspond with the standard that the Navy itself shall create.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what have we here? We have a suggestion solemnly made, and it is repeated by the gentleman from Tennessee in the very words of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that this great Government of ours has got into the bad shape that we can not manufacture a log chain; that we have not got capacity enough in the United States outside of the Department to make a chain. Did anybody ever hear any such proposition as that? The greatest chains, the biggest chains, the best chains to-day, are not manufactured by the Navy Department. The best chains in use on this continent are the chains made use of by the great ocean-going ships. Is it possible that after all these years of experimentation and experience we find ourselves in this year, when we have brought ourselves to where we are the greatest manufacturing nation on earth, that we are incapable of making a chain? Did anybody ever hear the like of that?

Mr. ROBERTS. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. GROSVENOR (continuing). Or say that we must pay this enormous and extravagant cost.

Mr. ROBERTS. Will the gentleman pardon me a moment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. ROBERTS. Is there any denial by the gentleman that the Navy Department have only succeeded in the last contract in inducing one firm in this country to make chains on the pattern that the Navy Department want?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well, and that, it appears, is a fad of somebody in the Bureau of Construction, and is not commended by the great naval constructors of the world. There is not such a chain made for the use of any navy on earth except ours. In the manufacture of that chain we are as far behind the other nations of the world as we are in a good many other things.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may continue for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I thank the gentleman from New York. I ought to say that the gentleman from New York was perfectly——

Mr. MCNARY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. He has made a statement——

Mr. GROSVENOR. One moment. I ought to say that the gentleman from New York was perfectly fair in asking me where those amendments go together. If he will wait until I offer the amendment, I will point out to him exactly. Now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts wants to ask me a question, I shall be glad to listen.

Mr. MCNARY. The gentleman from Ohio stated that the cables used on the ocean liners were better than the chains used in the Navy Department.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not offered a comparison, but I said something about like that.

Mr. MCNARY. I venture to say that the RECORD will show that the gentleman did use substantially those words, and that that was the purport of his statement to the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What are the words that you say I used?

Mr. MCNARY. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to page 393, where Admiral Manney testified——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not yielded for that. What are the words that the gentleman says justify his statement? I refer to the words he says I used.

Mr. MCNARY. The gentleman said substantially that the chains made by private manufacturers were the best chains made in the world.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did say so. Admiral Manney has been heard here repeatedly, and he has given his views about chains. He belongs to the Navy; he is on the retired list; and he would not under any circumstance permit a ship to be built outside of a navy-yard if he could help it. He would not permit anything to be done outside of a navy-yard if he could help it. There is no doubt about that. I do not impugn his motives; but he is an old gentleman, with prejudices in favor of the arm of the Government that he has been such an ornament to during his long life. I say to-day that the skill of the best workmen in the world has been brought to bear in the construction of the chains that are used at New London, and which were furnished there for the two great ships that were sent out to the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. McNARY. Let me read the statement showing that they never were tested, and are not as good as the navy-yard chains.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say they are.

Mr. McNARY. Admiral Manney knows more about it than you do.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I know just as much about it as you do, and neither one of us knows a thing in the world about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. McNARY. If I knew so many things that were not so as you do, I would not quote them so frequently.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will state to the gentleman, before he makes any more mistakes of fact, that we have the certificate of the inspector who inspected the very chains that I was talking about.

Mr. McNARY. Read it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will not. I will put it in the RECORD in my speech.

Mr. McNARY. Read it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And when I put it in the RECORD I hope the gentleman will take back what he has said.

Mr. McNARY. I do not believe you have it there.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have the word of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD]. He may state it for himself.

Mr. McNARY. I do not care anything about that. You said you had it. Read it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say we have it. I have read it. It is in the possession of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD].

Mr. McNARY. Then read it. When the gentleman makes the statement that he has things in his possession, I think, when demanded, he ought to give them to the committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I haven't said that I had it in my possession.

Mr. McNARY. Where is it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] has it in his room at the hotel.

Mr. McNARY. Oh, yes!

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman say that he has not?

Mr. McNARY. I have not said that he has not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But the gentleman said that he knew that the chains put on the great ships at New London were not inspected.

Mr. McNARY. Who said so?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Massachusetts said so.

Mr. McNARY. I said that Admiral Manney said so.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I am delighted to hear that the gentleman concedes that Admiral Manney made one mistake. Now, I said that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] has the statement at his room at the hotel.

Mr. McNARY. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, I will read what Admiral Manney said.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I now have in my possession, kindly handed to me by Mr. LOUD, who thought he did not have the statement with him, but which he has happily found among the accumulation of papers on his desk, the statement to which I referred when I denied the accuracy of Admiral Manney's statement and insisted that the chains used by the Minnesota and Dakota had all been tested by the highest possible test in the world, and it gives me great pleasure, for the benefit of the gentlemen of the committee and because my veracity in that respect was unfortunately challenged by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, to put into the RECORD the letter upon which I have relied for the statement which I made, and which I now challenge contradiction of by any man living. Here it is:

LLOYD'S REGISTER OF SHIPPING,
Philadelphia, March 17, 1906.

GEORGE A. LOUD, M. C., Esq.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of March 14 regarding a statement made by Admiral Manney that the 3⅞-inch cable chain supplied to the steamships Minnesota and Dakota were not tested, I have pleasure to inform you that this statement is incorrect, as the entire outfit of cables were tested by one of our staff both for breaking and proof tests at the works of the makers, the Lebanon Chain Works, Pennsylvania.

The Lebanon Chain Works, Pennsylvania, have a chain-testing machine capable of testing up to 600,000 pounds, which can deal with chain even of greater dimensions than in this case. I may further state that all vessels built to class with Lloyd's Register of Shipping must and do have their cables and anchors tested as required by the rules.

I have not the slightest objection of you quoting us in this matter.

Very faithfully, yours,

ROBERT HAIG.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD], a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, is one of the most painstaking and careful Members of this House. He is a man of large experience in kindred business to the Navy. He was connected to some extent with the Navy when Admiral Dewey won his great battle and made his name immortal and stepped into the niche where will stand for all future time the John Paul Joneses, the Decaturs, the Dahlgrens, and other brilliant men of the American Navy side by side with the Nelsons and Togos and scores of others who might be named in the foreign navies. This gentleman [Mr. LOUD] has made an exhaustive study of this matter, and he has made it openly and above board, and he has kindly furnished to me a copy of a letter which he addressed to the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, in which all these defects of administration are shown. Here it is:

Mr. TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: A few days ago when I had a personal conference with you relative to the manufacture of naval equipment at the Boston Navy-Yard you requested that I should put my information and views on the subject in writing, which I will now endeavor to do.

The largest items being manufactured at that yard are anchors, chains, wire rope, and cordage. The basis of my information is to be found on page 7, in the Report of the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment for 1905, and hearing No. 49, by Rear-Admiral Manney, before the Naval Committee of Congress, particularly on pages 418, 419, and 420 of said hearing.

Anchors.—Taking up first the subject of anchors manufactured during past year, you will notice the last item at the bottom of page 7, the output at this factory, was 605,483 pounds, costing $81,564.12, or 13½ cents per pound.

On page 418 of hearing No. 49 you will find cost of anchors of private make, according to statement of Admiral Manney, 5½ cents fo ranchors under 1,000 pounds and 6 cents to 8½ cents for anchors over 1,000 pounds.

I have further information on this subject from the Department of Commerce and Labor, Light-House Establishment, who advise me that they have paid for forged fluke anchors 5¾ cents to 6 cents per pound, also for forged stockless anchors 6 cents per pound.

The Newport News Shipbuilding Company, in their letter to me of March 9, state:

"With regard to anchors, I beg to say that while the price varies with market conditions, from 7 cents to 7½ cents per pound would be a fair average figure for forged anchors."

From the letter of the Treasury Department, Revenue-Cutter Service, dated March 15, I am advised that they have paid from 4¾ cents to 6½ cents per pound for forged anchors.

I find that a shipbuilding company which lately constructed light-house boats for the Light-House Service furnished forged anchors therefor weighing 11,925 pounds costing $4.98 per 100 pounds, or practically 5 cents per pound.

You will notice in Exhibit A of the hearing that the cost of 8,000-pound anchors at the factory in the Boston Navy-Yard was $17.65 per 100 pounds, and for 14,500-pound anchors, $15.39 per 100 pounds, which makes the relative cost in this instance of 5 cents for the forged anchors furnished to the Government light-ships, as against about 16 cents Government manufacture.

As forged anchors are now becoming nearly obsolete in the merchant service, cast-steel stockless being used instead, I have no further data on the subject of forged anchors; but, as to the cost of steel anchors, the American Shipbuilding Company on the Lakes are paying 4 cents per pound for cast steel anchors required for large lake freighters, and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, in their letter to me under date of March 23, state that for 12,500 and 14,000 Baldt stockless anchors they paid 4½ cents per pound f. o. b. Chester, Pa.

The anchors furnished to the steamship Minnesota and Dakota weighed 16,800 pounds each, and cost $3.65 per 100 pounds.

Chain.—Taking up the second subject of manufacture, chains and anchor cables, in the first item of the table given at the bottom of page 7, Report of the Bureau of Equipment, we find one-half-inch chain cable, 2,628 pounds, $632.78, showing cost per pound is 24 cents; five-eighths-inch chain cable, 2,887 pounds, costing $793.01, showing cost per pound is 27½ cents.

The highest market quotations on these sizes run from common chain, at $3.60 per 100 pounds, to the highest grade, $8.40 per 100 pounds, for the one-half-inch chain, and in this connection I will say that the purchasing department of the Isthmian Canal Commission, in a letter of April 28, show purchases of three-eighths-inch straight short-link iron chain at $3.94 per 100 pounds delivered on dock at Colon.

While the amount involved in the above manufacture of chain is so small that it is of little importance, nevertheless it shows the expense of Government manufacture to be abnormally large—that is, the cost at the Government factory being three times the market price of private made chain of the very highest quality. Will add to above information that the market price of best special dredge hand-made chain is $8.40 per 100 pounds for one-half-inch and $7.40 for five-eighths-inch. (See price list from Lebanon Chain Works, dated January 12.)

Taking up the subject of heavy anchor cables, the same table at the bottom of page 7 shows that 1⅞-inch costs 16 cents per pound, 1¾-inch costs 12¾ cents, 1½-inch costs 12½ cents, 1⅝-inch costs 11⅛ cents, or an average of over 13 cents per pound.

A letter from one of the largest shipbuilding companies there is in the United States for building ocean steamships shows cost of chain furnished in these sizes from $3.32 to $4.15 per 100 pounds.

As to cables 2 inches and larger, referring to the table at the bottom of page 7, we find the following items of output and cost, to which I have added the cost per pound derived from figures that are given. Noticing that these figures vary from 9½ cents per pound for 2¾-inch to 13¼ cents for 2⅞-inch cables, without apparent reason for the wide divergence in cost, I have put the figures together in these six items.

Size.	Output.	Cost.	Average cost per pound.
	Pounds.
2 inches	227,148	$22,004.43	$0.0966
2 1/16 inches	30,200	3,624.00	.1200
2⅛ inches	11,816	1,119.20	.1000
2¼ inches	878,733	94,560.87	.1075
2⅜ inches	1,011,941	133,241.55	.1320
2½ inches	218,422	20,805.90	.0950
Total	2,378,260	275,355.90	.1158

We therefore find that the average cost of all the cable manufactured, 2 inches and upward, was $11.58 per 100 pounds, the largest item being 2⅞-inch cable, shown above to have been $13.20 per 100 pounds.

While Admiral Manney, in hearing No. 49, for comparison between Government cost and contract price paid to private manufacturers, has stated that the Government cost was 9½ cents, or $9.50 per 100 pounds, I believe that we must hold that the cost of this item is not to be considered as the average Government cost, but we must take the average cost of $11.58 per 100 pounds; or if we wish to be more particular, we must take, jointly, the last two items of 2⅞ inches and 2¾ inches in above table, which if so considered, would make the average price of these two items $12.50 per 100 pounds.

While this indicates the cost of the output of the Government shops, it is not the actual or full cost. The first, second, and tenth items in table at bottom of page 5, Report of Bureau of Equipment, viz:

Office and store labor, handling coal, shipments, annual leave, etc	$103,428.82
Repairs and additions and maintenance of machinery plant	56,157.33
Miscellaneous articles	53,262.09
Total	212,848.24

This amount, $212,848.24, together with other items not given, must be spread to a more or less extent over the seven items of output shown in that table to give the real cost.

If spread evenly or pro rata, this increase by 12½ per cent or more the cost shown in tables on page 7. By adding 12½ per cent to $12.50, we have $14 per 100 pounds, or 14 cents per pound, the actual cost of the 2⅞-inch and 2¾-inch cable made in the Government shop.

From evidence given in the hearing we find the largest-sized battleship cables, 2¾ inches, have been made by contract by private firms: 9½ cents per pound for cables made by the Lebanon Chain Works, and 8⅝ cents per pound for cables contracted for, but not delivered, by the Monongahela Iron and Steel Works.

I wish to state here that upon careful consideration of the subject it is my belief that all of the battle-ship cables desired of this specification, any size, can be purchased by contract at from 6 to 7 cents per pound under the same specification as to strength or breaking strain as now required, but eliminating the absurd and impossible chemical specification, especially as to sulphur content, which has the effect of ruling out competition and forcing the Government to pay a needlessly high price.

As to anchor cables larger than 2 inches I can give you the following information: One of the largest ocean shipbuilding firms in the United States advises me that they pay $4.15 per 100 pounds for 2½-inch anchor cables, $4.30 per 100 pounds for 2¾-inch, and $3.85 per 100 pounds for two and one-sixteenth inches.

Large freighters on the Great Lakes, last built, for 2⅛-inch tested stud-link cable chains paid $3.30 per 100 pounds.

I am advised by Cramp & Sons Shipbuilding Company that the 2⅞-inch anchor cables furnished by them to the Russian crusier Retvizan, British Admiralty test, was $4.50 per 100 pounds, while the 2⅛-inch cable furnished the cruiser Variag, British Admiralty test, was $3.70 per 100 pounds.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company in their letter of March 23 advise me that they pay for 1⅝-inch stud-link tested cable chain $4.50 per 100 pounds, f. o. b. Philadelphia for steamship Costa Rica, also 1¾-inch and 1⅞-inch tested stud-link cable chain for steamship City of Para and steamship Barracouta, both at $3.60 per 100 pounds delivered in New York, also 1⅞-inch tested stud-link cable chain for steamship Acapulco at $3.74 per 100 pounds delivered in New York.

In a letter from the Upson-Walton Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, which, I believe, is the largest ship-chandlery firm on the Great Lakes, we find the following paragraph relating to chains:

"We do not sell the chains for the new steamers that are fitting out on the Lakes, the margin being so close on these goods that the manufacturers sell them direct. Our cost price is the same, we are told, as the price charged the shipyards; and on the regular grade of chain, such as is used by these parties, the cost up to 2 inches to-day is $3.56 per hundred pounds, freight allowed to Cleveland from factory; and on the best quality of dredge chain the cost on the same sizes is $4.75 per hundred pounds, this being, however, a much finer quality of chain than is used on the Lakes."

From the American Shipbuilding Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, I have the following:

MARCH 17, 1906.

Hon. GEORGE A. LOUD, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of the 14th instant, you of course know that we do comparatively nothing in the line of Government work here on the Lakes, and I am not, therefore, able to give you any idea as to the cost of chain cable made to Government specifications. It is my opinion, however, that your estimate of 6 cents ought not to be far out of the way.

We have purchased during the past five years somewhere between 2,000 and 3,000 tons of stud-link chain cable for use in merchant work, and an average price during that period would be a fraction under your estimate of 4 cents.

As to anchors, we use nothing but cast steel; consequently I am unable to give you a price on forged.

The average price on cast-steel anchors for the past five years would be, I judge, between 5 and 6 cents per pound.

Hoping this will give you the information you desire, I am,

Yours, respectfully,

N. S. THRASHER, Purchasing Agent.

It is perfectly understood by me that these cables for merchant service, costing from $3.30 to $4.30 per 100 pounds, are not up to the specifications of the United States Navy, and are not given for comparison, but are given to show that all vessels outside of the United States Navy are equipped with cables costing less than 5 cents per pound, in size 2⅝ inches and under, this being the largest size brought to my notice, with the exception of the four steamers on the Pacific, the Minnesota, Dakota, Manchuria, and Mongolia.

The cables on the Minnesota and Dakota are 3 1/16 inches in diameter, and the price paid for them was $5.43 per 100 pounds, delivered at New London, Conn.

Quoting from a letter of the Eastern Shipbuilding Company, under date of March 21, we find the following:

"You are right in assuming that the price which we paid for those chains was high, but you must realize that these were very difficult chains to make, the weight of each link being as much as one man could handle. Smaller size chain, of course, cost very much less, as you note from my previous letter that the 1⅞-inch chain cost $3.75 per 100 pounds (this size chain being large enough for most ships built in this country). I wish to impress upon you, however, that Lloyd's inspection greatly increases the cost of the chain, as their test is very severe, involving much handling of same, cutting out of links, etc."

There was doubt expressed by Admiral Manney before the committee (see hearing No. 49) as to these cables being inspected. The cost of Lloyd's inspection adds one-half cent per pound to all chains so inspected. (Lebanon Chain Works, January 12.)

As to these particular chains being inspected, we find by letter from the Eastern Shipbuilding Company, under date of March 17, the following:

"These chain cables are 3 1/16 inches in diameter; they were the largest ever manufactured at that time, and it was deemed of great importance that same should have very careful inspection. Therefore these chains were inspected by Lloyd's local inspector at the chain works, of Lloyd's principal surveyor in this country, and again by Lloyd's surveyor after same had arrived at the works of the Eastern Shipbuilding Company."

The chain cables were manufactured by Lebanon Chain Works, and the steel anchors were made by Seabord Steel Casting Company. The 3 1/16-inch chain cost $5.43 per 100 pounds; the 1⅞-inch chain cost $3.75 per 100 pounds, and the anchors cost $3.65 per 100 pounds.

In conclusion I wish to state that the steamships Minnesota and Dakota were built under the rules of Lloyd's Register of Shipping, and all machinery, appliances, etc., pertaining to these ships were also classed by Lloyd's (who were very rigid in their inspection), and all received the highest certificates of classification issued by said society.

Of course you know that Lloyd's is a British society. Owners find it necessary, owing to insurance of both ship and cargo, to have Lloyd's classification. (See page 13½.)

As to the cost of the cables furnished by the builders of the Manchuria and Mongolia, we find the size to be 3⅜ inches, and price paid $5.36 per 100 pounds.

I am advised by the manufacturers of these cables that the same ratio of strength and breaking strain was given to these cables as is required of the 2¾-inch Government battle-ship cables.

From all this data we find that the very best anchor cables supplied to any ship built in the United States, outside of the United States Navy, cost $5.45 per 100 pounds, the same being tested to the same breaking strain as required by the United States Navy, and as compared with this cost it has cost the Government $13 to $14 per 100 pounds for the same quality of cable.

It is presumable that the reply or explanation of why the Government cables cost so much more than cables made by private firms is that the material costs so much more. While in a small measure this is true, the difference in cost of material being about 2 cents per pound, sustaining this phase of the question, I find in letter of April 20, from the Bureau of Equipment, the statement that the last three contracts made during the last two years with the Monongahela Iron and Steel Company covered 2,800 tons, at $87.36 per ton, showing that this company have sold to the Boston yard this amount of material, costing $244.608, the price being $4.368 per hundred pounds.

Permit me to state my belief that this excessive price is solely due to the needless specification in the chemical analysis of the material, principally relating to sulphur content.

The specification that iron shall not contain more than one one-hundredth of 1 per cent sulphur rules out practically, and, I believe, effectively, all competition, giving this company an absolute monopoly and enabling them to maintain an unreasonably high price for their iron.

I am sustained in this opinion by the following letter from the chemist at the United States navy-yard:

UNITED STATES NAVY-YARD,
Washington, D. C., March 16, 1906.

Hon. GEORGE A. LOUD, M. C.,
House of Representatives, United States.

SIR: It gives me great pleasure to be able to comply with your request in letter of the 14th instant, received last night.

Samples of chain iron from Lebanon Chain Works, marked and reported as stated below, showed the following composition:

	July 21, 1904.		Aug. 9, 1904.
	No. 1.	No. 2.	No. 3.	No. 4.
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
Carbon	a 0.01	a 0.01	0.0196	0.019
Silicon	.15	.14	.141	.131
Sulphur	.019	.018	.020	.022
Phosphorus	.061	.062	.055	.059
Manganese	.070	.075	.082	.060

a Below.

While these results do not exactly agree with the specifications it is my opinion that the iron is of very good quality. It is also my opinion that even for the best iron makers it will be a somewhat difficult proposition to always keep within the requirements of the specifications. A deviation, such as above results show, should, in my opinion, not be cause for rejection.

Trusting that this will answer your inquiry, and always ready to furnish any information which I possess and you should desire, I am,

Very respectfully, yours,

JOS. WESTISSON, Chemist N. G. F.

Permit me to call your attention further to the fact shown in your statement sent to me by the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts of bar iron purchased in the last two years that out of all the contracts made by the Department, involving over fifty tons in any contract, that out of the eleven contracts so shown eight of the contracts were made with this same firm, covering $120,133.13, while only three contracts in two years were given to other firms, the three contracts amounting to $15,261.45, or combining these two statements we find that in all this company has furnished iron to the amount of $364,741.13, as against contracts to other parties amounting to $15,261.45, and I am sure your Department will find on careful and candid investigation that this fact is solely due to the unnecessary chemical specification.

Cordage.—As to the subject of rope manufactured in the Government factory, we find that the amount of Manila rope invoiced during the year (see first item, second table, page 7, Report Bureau of Equipment) was 1,697,341 pounds, costing $265,536.72, or 15⅝ cents per pound, to which 12½ per cent at least, incidental and omitted expense, should be added.

In a letter from Mr. D. W. Ross, general purchasing officer of the Isthmian Canal Commission, under date of April 27, I note that they have paid for ordinary Manila rope, 180 coils, from 10½ cents to 11 cents per pound delivered at Colon. This, I understand, would not be up to the grade of best rope made, in the ropewalk at the Boston yard, but I find an item in the same letter of 216,000 feet Manila bolt rope, tallow laid, long fiber, smooth and hard finish, at 10¾ cents to 12¾ cents per pound, delivered on dock at Colon.

As the price herein given includes not only the fixed charges incident to all manufacure, viz, cost of plant, deterioration, renewals, insurance, taxes, interest, and profits, but also delivery from the manufactory to Colon as well, and when we further consider that in figuring the cost of rope made by the Government that clerical work, work of the pay department, and other similar items will be found omited in the make-up of cost, and further consider that in the item of rope the cost of material is large, and the cost of labor should be relatively small, all point to the conclusion that the cost of the Government manufacture is very excessive, in fact, unreasonably so.

The output of material in question at the Boston yard is as follows:

Anchor and chain shops, 3,408,022 pounds	$422, 772. 59
Add 12½ per cent for omitted material and expenses	52, 846. 57
Total	475, 619. 16
Cordage invoiced, 2,632,298 pounds	399, 433. 94
Add 12½ per cent for omitted material and expenses	49, 929. 24
Total	449, 363. 18

If bought in open market, quality being equal, there should be a saving of:

Anchor, chains, etc., 50 per cent	$237, 809. 58
Cordage, 20 per cent	89, 872. 63
Total	327, 682. 21

The foregoing sums up the facts, and my estimates so far as I can at this time give them, and proceeding now to your question, what I would advise being done under such conditions as are shown, my answer would be that I would surely close one or the other or both of these manufactories as an object lesson to the other manufactories maintained by the Navy Department that the cost of the product must be kept within reasonable bounds.

It is my opinion that while the hours worked under the Government are less per day than in private manufactories, and that it is universally conceded that labor is not as effective under Government management, as in private institutions, nevertheless the elimination from the cost of Government output of the fixed charges heretofore mentioned, viz, cost of plant, deterioration, renewals, insurance, interest, taxes, and profits, should make the conditions not far from even, and with such allowance and consideration of conditions it should not cost the Government any more to manufacture such material as we have in question than it would to buy in the open market, and if the cost can not be brought approximately equal, the Government should cease to manufacture the material and buy in the open market.

I am, very sincerely, yours, GEO. A. LOUD.

It is left to the Congress of the United States to right these errors of administration. The officers of our Navy are men of very high character as naval officers, but I have never believed, and I do not now, and I say it with all respect for those gentlemen, that the school of the Navy necessarily fits an officer for the business administration of the construction department of the Navy. There is too much of routine, too much of antiquity, too much of respect for precedent, and the Navy Department of this Government that is expending on an average a hundred million dollars a year, ought to be administered by the highest type of business capacity—such men as handle the great steel manufactories; such men as handle the great railroad industries. How that can be brought about I do not know, but here is an opportunity, without any disparagement of the officers of the Navy, to introduce one reform into the administration.

I offer the following as an amendment for the pending amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended in the manufacturing in any Government navy-yard of any chains, anchors, or cordage which can be obtained in the free markets of the country at a less cost than the manufacture of the same article will cost in the navy-yards by bids at the solicitation of the Department or in such other manner as the Department may choose: And provided further, That all such articles shall be of a standard of quality to be fixed by the Navy Department.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope this amendment may be agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. OLMSTED having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. R. 47. Joint resolution granting condemned cannon for a statue to Governor Stevens T. Mason, of Michigan; and

S. 4956. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon at Versailles, in the State of Kentucky.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 4094. An act to amend section 4426 of the Revised Statutes of the United States—regulation of motor boats;

S. 2292. An act for the relief of certain entrymen and settlers within the limits of the Northern Pacific Railway land grant;

S. 1975. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Dugger; and

S. 5498. An act granting additional lands from the Fort Douglas Military Reservation to the University of Utah.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 13946. An act for the relief of Charles L. Allen.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution No. 31.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be requested to return the bill (H. R. 8948) entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to John W. Hammond."

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. VREELAND was recognized.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I shall move to close debate in ten minutes.

Mr. ROBERTS. Oh, I hope that motion will not prevail, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Chairman, I am now and have always been in this body opposed to the Government manufacture of articles needed by it. If this were a new proposition before the House, namely, that we should establish a plant at Boston or elsewhere for the manufacture of chains, I should be opposed to it. I should be opposed to an original proposition for the establishment of a plant by the Government of the United States for making chains, because my observation on the committee and elsewhere has led me invariably to the conclusion that it costs the Government of the United States much more to manufacture for itself than it does to buy in the market of private manufacturers.

The Government has this plant on hand. It has the plant at Boston that has been paid for and is equipped with machinery to make chains, is equipped with skilled workmen to carry on the plant.

Mr. KELIHER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VREELAND. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. KELIHER. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that it was developed in the discussion of the Army appropriation bill that the Government was forced by the powder trust to pay much more than it ought for powder, owing to the fact that there was a trust, the Dupont powder trust; and did not the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], make the statement on the floor that if the proposition came before the House that would provide for the manufacture of powder by the Government he would vote for the proposition; and is it not likely that a similar condition might develop in this line?

Mr. VREELAND. I do not care to go off into that question, Mr. Chairman, any more than to say that where the Government finds itself confronted by a trust which puts up the price beyond a fair profit, and it finds that no competition enters to break the price, I think it would be justified in establishing a plant of its own.

I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that we have the plant at Boston, on which the Government has spent a great deal of money, equipped with the necessary machinery and with skilled workmen to carry it on. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, namely, that in competing for these chains in the open market the standard now fixed by the Government shall be required, makes this amendment a proper one to be adopted by this committee. At the same time, I do not think the committee ought to have an exaggerated notion of the difference of expense in making the chains in the Government plant and in the outside market. I understand my friend from Michigan [Mr. LOUD], who has given this subject a great deal of attention and who is entitled to a great deal of credit therefor—I think the difference he states to the House is a little larger than ought to be stated with due regard to the truth. I think he claims that these chains for battle ships can be bought for 6 or 7 cents a pound in the open market, but I have here a letter from the Monongahela Iron Company, which now has the contract for building chains for the Government battle ships, in which they state the contract price is 8½ cents a pound. They state, in addition to that, that they must purchase the swivels, shackles, and jew's-harps of outside parties and that they are much more expensive than the balance of the chains.

They say, in conclusion, that they do not know yet whether they can get out even on their contract with the Government for making these chains at 8½ cents. I think it is fair to state from their letter, which I will put in the RECORD, that they expect it will cost them more than 8½ cents to make these chains and complete them. Perhaps it will cost them 10 cents, and that brings it up very close to the price that it is alleged we pay for making them in the Government plant at Boston.

Mr. Chairman, the making of these chains for battle ships is not so simple a matter as my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] would have us believe. I want to state further that my information is that the Lloyd test, talked about before the committee, is a test for the breaking strength of the chain, the tensile strength of the chain. Now, the experts on this subject say that that is not the great trouble; that chains which are made of steel and scrap iron and muck iron, as they call it, will show a very high resisting or tensile strength, but the trouble is unless they are made of first-class material, as provided by Government specifications, the chain rapidly wears away. The battle ship starts off to be gone for three or four years on the China station, and the anchor is in constant use. The chain constantly rubs away, because it is not of the quality to resist the friction, and pretty soon the battle ship finds itself with a chain much weakened and unable to stand the test.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to read this letter that I have in my hand for the benefit of all the members of the committee.

Mr. VREELAND. Oh, I wish the gentleman from Ohio would wait until I am through.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly; I thought the gentleman was through.

Mr. VREELAND. Unless it is something that I ought to know.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, it is something that the gentleman ought to know.

Mr. VREELAND. Well, perhaps when I get through the gentleman will have so much information that he will not find it necessary to read the letter. The committee having given me additional time, I desire to read this letter from the Monongahela Iron Works, which, it appears, has the contract for making these chains for battle ships for the Government. I think the information in it is such that the committee will be glad to hear it, now we are on this subject. It is as follows:

FEBRUARY 28, 1906.

Hon. GEORGE LOUD,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter, with a copy of the hearing before the Naval Committee, received, in which you desire us to give you some information in regard to same.

In reply would say that we do not agree with you that good chain can be made for 4 cents per pound, as the price on the best chain iron made, both foreign and domestic, can not be had for less than 4 to 6½ cents per pound. Then add to this the cost of labor, waste in manufacture (which includes the samples made necessary for testing), and the swivels, shackles, and jew's-harps, which are more expensive in making than the ordinary links.

At present we are making a cable chain for the Government at 8½ cents per pound, but we are forced to give out the swivels, jew's-harps, and shackles to other parties to make, as it is especial work and can not be made by the same workmen. We are quoted 24 cents per pound for the labor on the swivels and jew's-harps, and we furnish the iron, and 12 cents per pound for the labor on the shackles. This, you see, adds to the expense of the chain.

We think from our experience that no material is too good for any place where life and property are in danger, and we are sorry to say that most all chain manufacturers in this country make about 90 per cent of the chain from steel and scrap iron, both qualities of which are treacherous and dangerous and lack uniformity and reliability. We very much regret that chains are not tested and inspected the same as steam boilers are, both on land and water. We all know that it is necessary to test steam boilers, and it should be equally so in regard to chain, as we believe that more people are injured and lives lost by the use of poor chain than by all the steam boilers. In addition to the poor quality of material in chain, people use chains too long and allow them to wear away, which they naturally do, and do not replace them until they are broken. This is unfortunate and should be corrected, and a national law should be passed to prevent people using such chains that are dangerous on account of the quality and of the excessive wear on the chain when in use.

There is no comparison between the Government chain and the ordinary chain made for merchant vessels. Chains made for merchant vessels are made from material that will stand low tensile strength only, and no elongation or reduction of area or chemical analysis is required. This has been the practice for many years, and shipbuilders do not desire it changed as it will only add to the cost, and they purchase whatever is cheapest, not what is best. The chains which they purchase are made from steel or scrap iron, sometimes with an admixture of muck iron, and can be purchased very low on account of the very poor material in them.

We all know that chain iron made from more than one quality of material lacks uniformity and reliability, and it is always the case where scrap iron is used, and is more liable to break than chain made from a uniform quality of material. Chains made from steel are not uniform on account of the process by which the steel is made, as all ingots of steel have segregation in them which can not be overcome by the makers.

Anchor chains used in merchant vessels are tested by Lloyd's Association, and are only required to stand low tensile strength. Ordinary iron will answer for the test, but for actual use it is very dangerous. Shipbuilders do not want to buy what is best, but what is cheapest.

Lloyd's Association did not make out the specification for chain iron, as the writer was informed by its officers while in Europe some three years ago. This matter was left entirely to the shipbuilders.

We have bid upon chains for merchant vessels, and have lost the orders every time on account of the price and poor iron put in by our competitors.

In conclusion, we beg to state that we are now working on a process that has reduced the cost of making chain fully 50 per cent. This has been accomplished by experimenting almost continuously for over three years. The machine that shears and bends the links performs its work perfectly, and leaves very little more for the welder to accomplish. The links are sheared and formed for end welding, which is the most desirable to make, as it enables the workmen to have sufficient material for making a perfect weld, and at the same time allows him to distribute it equally on both sides of the links, thereby making uniform quality and size on both sides of the links. Side welding will not permit this, as it forces the links out of shape and changes the quality and size on the side of the links on which the weld is made.

In addition to this, there is more danger in side welding than in end welding. This has been proven by many tests made during our experience. We have sheared the iron at the angle ready for welding, and bent it for side welding. We have also sheared the iron and bent it ready for end welding, and have tested both before welding, and found that the links bent for end welding would stand double the test of those bent for side welding. This, you see, is a decided advantage—that the end welding should be the only one made. Some of the leading chain makers of the country have stated that end welding could not be made in large sizes. This is a mistake, as they have only followed the old method and belief which is practiced in Europe.

The welding by this process can be done with a less number of heats on the links, as repeated heats always deteriorate and weaken quality of all kinds of material.

On referring to the order which we have taken at 8½ cents per pound, we beg to state that we can not tell at present just what this chain will cost us, and that it may prove more or less than the price at which we took it. Nevertheless we are satisfied that it will be a perfect chain, made from the best iron, and will give the best satisfaction where safety, durability, and reliability are required.

MONONGAHELA IRON AND STEEL CO.,
R. A. CARTER, President.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. VREELAND. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if this letter is not written by a gentleman who has the monopoly of furnishing the iron to the Navy Department for these chains?

Mr. VREELAND. I understand not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am told that he furnishes it all.

Mr. VREELAND. I understand that another firm has furnished more chains for the Government than this firm has.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand what the gentleman furnishes is the iron, and he has a peculiar test made which gives him the entire monopoly against the bids of everybody else.

Mr. VREELAND. That may be. I do not think it is material whether that is so or not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not think it is, but I want to get at the facts.

Mr. VREELAND. Now, Mr. Chairman, we can hardly assume that the tests made by the Navy Department are made for any other purpose than that of obtaining chains which are proper for use upon battle ships. It is certainly the case that when we build a battle ship worth seven, eight, or nine million dollars, when we put seven or eight hundred men in it, we want the very best chain and anchor that can be built by human skill. I call your attention to another difference between battle ships and merchant vessels. The merchant vessels nearly always go to docks, and they are tied up there, whereas your battle ships always anchor out in the open roadstead, and therefore have to have a stronger chain and one that will stand a great deal of use and a greater test than those in use in the merchant marine. Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, that these chains must come up to the test as fixed by the Navy Department, it is proper to adopt this resolution. If the Navy people in charge of the plant at Boston, furnished with complete equipment, furnished with a plant free of cost, charged with nothing but the material that goes into the chain and with the labor that makes it—if with all those advantages they can not make the chain as cheap as we can buy it in the market, then I am free to say I am willing to go into the open market and buy it. [Applause.]

I will print as part of my remarks the following letters:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 9, 1906.

SIR: My attention has been called to an amendment proposed by Mr. LOUD, as it appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 8, 1906, on page 6728, which would, in the bill, on page 15, in line 7, after the word "navy-yards," insert: "Provided, That anchors, chains, and cordage shall be purchased in open market, unless all or any part of such material can be manufactured at equal or less cost in the Government shops."

In this connection I beg to inclose—

First. A communication addressed to the Department by the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment, May 9, 1906.

Second. Letter, February 28, 1906, from the Monongahela Iron and Steel Company to Hon. GEORGE LOUD.

Third. Several other letters in connection with this matter, beginning with the one addressed to Mr. Carter by the manager of the Monongahela Iron and Steel Company.

The question of the enactment of this amendment into law is one that affects the general policy of the Government with reference to its navy-yards in all parts of the country, and that is whether or not the Government shall manufacture anything which can be manufactured at equal or less cost by private enterprise.

The Government never has nor can it manufacture in small quantities articles of equipment such as mentioned in this amendment at a price to compete with corporations which manufacture but one article alone, and that in large quantities; but up to the present time Congress has deemed it wise that the Government should be in position to manufacture these and similar articles itself if at any time the combinations in regard to price by the manufacturers should become oppressive, and the fact that these shops of the Government are in existence certainly tends to prevent improper charges by manufacturers for articles which the Government can itself manufacture.

A careful reading of the letter addressed to Mr. LOUD by the Monongahela Iron and Steel Company will indicate, in a measure, the reasons why chain is more expensive under Government specifications than elsewhere, and I believe that you will realize that no reasonable requirements can be too great for the chains and anchors which, under stress of weather, may be required to save the lives of, say, 900 officers and men and six or seven million dollars' worth of Government property. I sincerely hope that Congress will approve of the great care and caution exercised by the officers of the Navy Department to secure for the Government the greatest possible factor of safety in the manufacture of materials above mentioned.

I have the honor to be,
Very respectfully, yours,

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY, BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT,
Washington, D. C., May 9, 1906.

SIR: 1. The Bureau notes from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, containing the proceedings of the House of Representatives of May 8, on page 6728, there was introduced by Mr. LOUD an amendment to the appropriation "Equipment of vessels," under this Bureau, which amendment was afterwards modified by an amendment submitted by Mr. GROSVENOR providing "that no part of said sum shall be expended in the manufacture in any Government navy-yard of any article which can be obtained in the free market at a less cost than the cost to manufacture in such navy-yard."

2. This amendment has been brought forth by consideration of the question of cost to manufacture anchors and anchor cables and their appurtenances at the Boston Navy-Yard, which has been the subject of general discussion, the Bureau understands, since the naval bill was originally reported.

3. So far as this Bureau is aware, the claim has not been made, nor is it believed that it has ever been claimed, that anchors and chains can be manufactured by the Government as cheaply as they may be manufactured by outside commercial institutions; nor is such a claim made by this Bureau with regard to any other articles of ship's equipment that are manufactured in navy-yards, when the question of cost only is considered. The Bureau does claim, however, that, considering the quality of articles manufactured in navy-yards, which must be maintained at any cost (this is especially true with regard to anchors and anchor cables, upon which the safety of the ship and her crew depends), the Government can produce any article for which it has facilities at as low a cost, if not lower, than they can be produced in commercial establishments.

4. The effect of the proposed amendment would be disastrous to the manufacturing plants at all of the navy-yards, so far as the Bureau of Equipment is concerned, and will make it necessary for the Bureau to go into the market to buy the articles that it now manufactures, with the result of a marked depreciation in quality, and what will ultimately result in a considerable loss to the Government, if not in disasters of great magnitude, resulting from defective anchors or cables.

5. As bearing on the subject of the relative cost to manufacture anchor cables in the Government and in private establishments, the Bureau forwards herewith copy of a letter written by Mr. R. A. Carter, president of the Monongahela Iron and Steel Company, of Pittsburg, Pa., one of the large establishments manufacturing chain cables in this country, to the Hon. Mr. LOUD. It will be noted that Mr. Carter states in this communication, in paragraph 3, that they are manufacturing chain cables for the Government at 8½ cents per pound, and that they were forced to give out the manufacture of the swivels, etc., to other parties.

The Bureau incloses another communication from the Monongahela Iron and Steel Company to Mr. Carter, showing the difficulty encountered by that concern in getting these swivels and shackles manufactured.

If the Navy is required to depend on private establishments for its equipment, and especially its chain cables, it is not difficult to see what may be expected. The comments in this communication are commended to you for your earnest consideration.

The Bureau hopes that no effort will be spared to cause the rejection of the proposed amendment.

Very respectfully,

WM. S. COWLES,
Chief of Bureau of Equipment.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

MONONGAHELA IRON AND STEEL COMPANY,
Pittsburg, Pa., April 26, 1906.

R. A. CARTER,
President, Monongahela Iron and Steel Company,
Pittsburg, Pa.

DEAR SIR: Referring to your request for information as to what has been done regarding our efforts to get the swivels, shackles, etc., for the 2¾-inch cable chain which we are making for the United States Navy Department, on contract No. 7918, would advise we took the matter up with C. E. Dixon & Son, of this city, last December, and they quoted us price of 10 cents and 16 cents per pound, respectively, for shackles and swivels, which we accepted, but they, after examining the B/P's which we submitted, concluded the work was too heavy for them, and refused to go any further with it; then under date of January 17, wrote Bradlee & Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., and they replied, "were not in position to make." We then wrote William Barker & Son, of Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio, under date of January 24, and in reply they quoted us, respectively, 10 cents and 20 cents per pound for shackles and swivels, and we accordingly submitted B/P's, and their letter of February 5 states, after examining drawings they could not start making them under sixty days, and we replied the time required was too long. After these failures we learned through Mr. R. Zirpel that the M. H. Treadwell Company, of Lebanon, Pa., could make shackles, swivels, etc., and we immediately wrote them after receiving this information, under date of March 1, and they answered March 2, quoting us 9½ cents per pound for shackles, middle swivels 22 cents per pound, swivel shackles 22 cents per pound, and jew's-harp bending shackles 9½ cents per pound, and promised to complete within three to four weeks. We wrote them March 3, accepting these prices, also asking them to specify sizes they would require, which they did under date of March 6, and specified 32 hammered slabs averaging 9 inches wide by 6 inches thick by 18 inches long, which necessitated our rolling special iron, and same was submitted to the United States Engineering Department for testing and was accepted by them, and then shipped 9,528 pounds of 1⅞ inches square to the Cleveland City Forge and Iron Company, to forge into blooms required by the Treadwell Company, and may also say at an extra cost of 2 cents per pound, with freight both ways to Cleveland, and also same to Lebanon. In the meantime we rolled the few other sizes required, and considered we were out of our troubles, when we received a letter from the Treadwell Company, under date of March 31, saying their only smiths capable of doing this work were offered considerably more money than they could afford to pay, and then left their employ at once.

I learned from good authority that the man who took the smiths from Treadwell & Co. was Mr. Eli Atwood, of Lebanon, Pa., who some way or other learned that the Treadwell company had taken the contract to make the swivels, etc., for us, and immediately proceeded to hire the smiths at $5 per day, which he (Atwood) tells as follows: "I found out that the Treadwell people had contracted with the Monongahela Iron and Steel Company to make their swivels, etc., so I just sent my man over to see them and to offer them $5 per day each if they would come to work at my factory the following morning, so as to put the Monongahela against it, and the smiths accepted."

This method of doing business may be all right according to the Atwood standard, as he certainly has attained his end in this case, and it certainly has caused us great delay, with no immediate prospect of relief.

We wrote Treadwell & Co., asking them to give us names of firms that could make the swivels, etc., in question, and they mentioned Bradlee & Co., of Philadelphia (with whom we had previous correspondence), and the writer made a special trip East to get the work done, but was entirely unsuccessful. I visited the Atlantic Works, of East Boston, April 16, and they positively refused to do the work; also the Boston Forge Company, although prevailed upon Mr. Copeland, the manager, to accompany me to the Boston Navy-Yard and see the process of manufacture, but could not get him to do the work, although I impressed upon him it was not a matter of price. I learned in Boston of Mr. Conlin, foreman for Bradlee & Co., of Philadelphia, who could likely put me in touch with some firm, and called upon them the 18th instant with no result.

Appended you will find copies of correspondence with the various parties in question, and have done everything in our power to get the swivels, etc., made, but are unable.

Under the circumstances, I think it would be best for us to place the matter of making the swivels, etc., before the board, with a view of getting them made at the Boston Navy-Yard, as they have all the necessary tools and apparently nearly all the skilled workmen. It would be a very small matter for them to make the few swivels, shackles, etc., that we require and would be of great service to us, if the board should consider our request favorably, and of course we would pay whatever price is agreed upon. Could you arrange to visit the board and put our case before them?

Yours, respectfully,

MONONGAHELA IRON AND STEEL CO.
W. C. JOHNSTON.

JANUARY 17, 1906.

Messrs. BRADLEE & CO., Philadelphia, Pa.

GENTLEMEN: We would greatly appreciate your quoting us price for making 24 connecting shackles, 8 middle swivels, 4 swivel shackles, and 4 straight bending shackles for the 2¾-inch cables which we are now making in accordance with Government requirements, we to furnish the iron after it has passed inspection at our mills for the above.

If you can not make us the connecting shackles, we could get these made elsewhere, but would prefer to have you make all and hope you can arrange to do so for us.

Your early reply will oblige,

Yours, very truly,

MONONGAHELA IRON AND STEEL COMPANY, Pittsburg, Pa.

GENTLEMEN: Replying to your favor of the 17th instant, we very much regret our inability to quote you on the shackles, swivels, etc., for the 2¾-inch chain.

Our capacity for special forgings is very limited, and we have now so much work on hand and booked ahead for our regular trade that we could not possibly undertake this.

Yours, very truly,

BRADLEE & CO.

JANUARY 24, 1906.

Messrs. WILLIAM BARKER & SON,
Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio.

GENTLEMEN: We learn from Mr. Powers, of the Seneca Chain Company, that you are making swivels and shackles for them, and we shall be pleased to have you quote us a price for making twenty-four shackles, eight middle swivels, four connecting swivels, and four jew's-harps for 2¾-inch chain cables that we are to make for the United States Navy Department.

The iron will be inspected and tested at our works, and we wish you would name us a price for the work only, as we will prepay the freight to Cuyahoga Falls, and you can return it freight collect.

If you can do the work, we shall be pleased to forward you blueprints showing details of shackles, etc.

Please answer at once, and oblige,

Yours, very truly,

GENTLEMEN: We have your inquiry of the 24th instant at hand, and will say we can make the shackles for 10 cents per pound and the common swivels at 20 cents per pound, and if you will kindly send me drawings of the other swivels, etc., will name you a price on same.

Thanking you for the inquiry and trusting we will receive a part of your work at least, we remain,

Yours, truly,

WM. BARKER & SON.

JANUARY 31, 1906.

Messrs. WILLIAM BARKER & SON,
Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio.

GENTLEMEN: Yours of the 29th instant received, and send herewith drawings for shackles, etc. We shall require for the four chain cables, twenty-four connecting shackles (drawing 3995–25), eight middle swivels (drawing 3631–31), four swivel shackles (drawing 3630–31), and four jew's-harp bending shackles club and links (two drawings, 3875–25), and shall also require for testing one extra swivel and one extra shackle, and we will notify you as soon as the United States Navy inspector tells us which he will want.

We wish you would figure on size of iron wanted for each lot, and we will add one-sixteenth inch to iron we propose to send, as it will waste more or less in heating and working.

Our chain factory superintendent, Mr. C. Fellenbaum, will call on you and tell you anything he knows about making swivels, etc., if you so desire.

Let us hear from you in reply as soon as possible, and oblige,

Yours, very truly,

MONONGAHELA IRON AND STEEL COMPANY,

GENTLEMEN: In looking over the blueprints sent us by you, we find the swivels altogether different from what we are making for the Seneca Chain Company, of Kent, Ohio, and as we would have to make dies to form the different parts, it would be at least sixty days before we could start them, as we now have enough to run us that long, and which we must get out.

Trusting we have not put you to any delay, we remain,

Yours, truly,

WM. BARKER & SON.

Messrs. WILLIAM BARKER & SON,
Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio.

GENTLEMEN: Yours of the 5th instant received, and we regret to learn that you can not commence making the swivels and shackles before sixty days. It is impossible for us to wait that long, as our contract expires in about thirty days, and we must get them sooner.

Please return us the blueprints at once, and oblige,

MARCH 1, 1906.

Messrs. M. H. TREADWELL & CO.,
Lebanon, Pa.

GENTLEMEN: We have learned incidentally that you are forgers of shackles and swivels for large chains, and would ask you to kindly give us a price for forging twenty-four connecting shackles, eight middle swivels, four swivel shackles, and four jew's-harp bending shackle club and links for 2¾-inch cable. We are making four cables for the United States Navy Department, and would furnish you the iron f. o. b. Lebanon, you to return forgings to us freight charges collect.

Kindly advise us price per pound that you would furnish these forgings for, as it is very likely you know just what is required, as you have made plenty of them heretofore.

Your early reply will oblige.

Yours, very truly,

LEBANON, PA., March 2, 1906.

MONONGAHELA IRON AND STEEL COMPANY,
Pittsburg, Pa.

GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 1st instant received relative to shackles and swivels, etc. We are right in that line and are making a great many of them from time to time.

We could furnish same at the following prices:

Twenty-four connecting shackles, 9½ cents a pound.
Eight middle swivels, 22 cents a pound.
Four swivel shackles, 22 cents a pound.
Four jew's-harp bending shackles, 9½ cents a pound.

All for 2¾-inch cable, you to furnish the iron suitable for this work f. o. b. our works; our price is f. o. b. our works for the material complete. In case the iron breaks in testing you will have to reimburse us for replacing same, and you must also furnish the iron. If the break should occur at a weld we will fix same up at our expense.

If these prices are satisfactory, and you send us the order, we should have sketches or blueprints of what you require. We understand that these shackles and swivels are one-quarter inch heavier than the chain.

We could commence work as soon as we receive the iron, and probably complete them in about three or four weeks.

Yours, very truly,

M. H. TREADWELL & CO. OF PENNSYLVANIA.
JOHN HUNSICKER, Treasurer.

MARCH 3, 1906.

Messrs. M. H. TREADWELL & CO. (INCORPORATED),
Lebanon, Pa.

GENTLEMEN: Your favor of the 2d instant received, and we accept prices for forging the swivels and shackles, and send herewith blue prints covering same. You will let us know the size of material you will require for making the different forgings, and think it would be better if you add one-sixteenth inch to the finished size to allow for waste in making.

We shall require one extra shackle and one extra swivel which must be tested to destruction, but can not tell you just yet which one of the swivels the Government inspector will choose, but will explain the situation and ask him to designate what swivel he wants.

The minimum break for the cable is to be 443,000 pounds, and 5 per cent greater for swivels and shackles, which will bring the minimum breaking strain up to 465,000 pounds for the shackles and swivels. We assume you know a great deal more about it than we do, but think the welds will have to be brought around as if the eyes were punched in the solid iron and the shanks worked down; are doubtful if it would stand the high strain.

Kindly let us hear from you at your very early convenience, giving us sizes required, and we will make partial shipment so as not to delay the work.

Thanking you for prompt attention, we remain,

Yours, very truly,

MONONGAHELA IRON AND STEEL CO.

LEBANON, PA., March 6, 1906.

MONONGAHELA IRON AND STEEL COMPANY,
Pittsburg, Pa.

GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 3d instant received, containing order for swivels and shackles covered by your B/P, as follows:

Twenty-four connecting shackles.
Eight middle swivels.
Four swivel shackles.
Four jew's-harp bending shackles, club, and links for 2¾-inch cable.

You also state there will probably be one or two that will have to be tested to destruction, and will have to make extra ones for that purpose. Kindly let us know by return mail how many of each kind we shall make extra for testing to destruction.

It will require the following iron for twenty-four connecting shackles:

Twenty-four pieces, 3½ inches round by 4 feet 9 inches long.
Twenty-four pieces, 4 inches round by 12 inches long.
Twenty-four pieces, five-eighths inch round by 8 inches long.

For the bending shackles:

Four pieces, 9 inches by 6¾ inches by 26 inches.
Four pieces, 9 inches by 4 inches by 12 inches.
Four pieces, 4½ inches by 2⅛ inches by 19 inches.
Four pieces, 3 inches by 2 inches by 15 inches.

For eight swivels:

Eight pieces, 4½ inches by 9 inches by 15 inches.
Eight pieces, 6 inches by 9½ inches by 13½ inches.
Eight pieces, 1⅛ inches by 2 inches by 16 inches.

For the combination shackles and swivels:

Four pieces, 4½ inches by 9 inches by 15½ inches.
Four pieces, 6 inches by 9½ inches by 18 inches.
Four pieces, 3⅜ inches round by 12 inches.
Four pieces, 1⅛ inches by 2 inches by 16 inches.

Whatever kind you will want to test to destruction you will have to ship the additional iron along accordingly.

M. H. TREADWELL & CO. (INCORPORATED).

MARCH 7, 1906.

M. A. TREADWELL & CO.,
Lebanon, Pa.

GENTLEMEN: Yours of the 6th instant received, and in reply would advise that the iron will be inspected here by the Government inspector prior to shipment, and this will be final as regards tests.

The specifications call for one connecting shackle and one swivel, whether a swivel shackle or a middle swivel we do not know, but will find out definitely, and only one of each is required to be tested to destruction to pass the entire lot.

We will endeavor to get the iron for the connecting shackles, twenty-five pieces of each, as per your requisition, out first, and for the others we shall have to get hammered slabs for six of the sizes for bending shackles and swivels, and will place this in the hands of the forge at once.

Yours, very truly,

MONONGAHELA IRON AND STEEL CO.

GENTLEMEN: We have shipped you in C. & N. W. car No. 33246, eighty-five bars 1⅜ inches square billets, weight 9,528 pounds, which have passed Government inspection here and which you will please forge into—

Four pieces 9 by 6¾ by 2 feet 2 inches.
Four pieces 9 by 4 by 1 foot.
Eight pieces 9 by 4¾ by 1 foot 3 inches.
Eight pieces 9¼ by 6 by 1 foot 1½ inches.
Four pieces 9 by 4½ by 1 foot 3½ inches.
Four pieces 9¼ by 6 by 1 foot 6 inches.
Four pieces 4¼ by 2⅞ by 1 foot 7 inches.
Four pieces 3 by 2 by 1 foot 3 inches.

Applying on order of the 19th instant.

We have notified the Bureau of Equipment that we have forwarded this material to you for forging on account of U. S. A. contract No. 7918.

GENTLEMEN: Replying to your favor of the 2d instant, we regret that we can not tell you positively who can make the shackles and swivels for you, but we believe that Bradley & Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., can make them, and possibly the American Iron and Steel Manufacturing Company, of Lebanon, Pa.

Yours, very truly,

M. H. TREADWELL & CO., OF PENNSYLVANIA.

GENTLEMEN: In compliance with your request of the 6th instant we are inclosing herewith B/P's 3631–31, 3630–31, 3995–25, and 3875–25, showing large swivels and shackles, etc.

Yours, very truly,

M. H. TREADWELL & CO., OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate on this paragraph and amendments in ten minutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to have five minutes of that time.

Mr. ROBERTS. There is a new point that has been brought out by the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio which is an entirely new point in regard to the whole question, and I would like five minutes at least to point that out. Make it half an hour.

Mr. FOSS. I will make it half past 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in twenty-five minutes.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say I think that motion is an unfair motion, even though it has been carried. The gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the committee, and practically nobody but members of this committee have been allowed to say a word upon this matter, and yet now, when the time comes when somebody else desires to say something on the subject, they put up a time limit on debate; but let me in the short time I have call the attention of the House to the fact that again and again, through Admiral Manney's testimony on anchors, on wire rope, on chains, and on cordage, he stated that the quality made in the Boston Navy-Yard was superior to any manufactured outside, and that the outside products could not meet the Navy Department's tests. Now, in relation to those chains which have been specified on Pacific liners by the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Ohio, let me read on page 393 of Admiral Manney's testimony:

Mr. ROBERTS asked the Admiral if he could not get any end-weld chains made outside, and Admiral Manney replied:

Not on the larger chains. There are other points about the chain cables. The Boston chain, as I said, is of the highest-grade iron; it is better iron than is put in commercial chains. Much of the latter is unsuitable. Such chains are unduly heavy and liable to accident. The cables of the Pacific liners of which I spoke are, I believe, the largest ever made in this country—3⅞ inches; cost, $0.543 per pound. There is no machine in the United States that can test that cable for strength if it is of the best cable iron. It is safe to say that it has never been tested. These chains would not meet the Navy Department specifications. The increase of weight above that of the largest navy cable is for two cables 34,000 pounds (17 tons), which would have to be paid for at whatever the price per pound might be. Such weight is objectionable in a battle ship, because, as she carries from three to four cables, the unnecessary weight would bar out from 25½ to 34 tons of armor, ammunition, or coal. Two cables, the least number a merchant ship would carry, would have an unnecessary weight of 34,000 pounds, which would have to be paid for at the rate of 5½ cents per pound at least. High-grade chain of a smaller size costs even more per pound than the larger cable. The latest contract made by the Bureau for 2¾-inch chain is with a Pittsburg firm for 8½ cents; 2¾-inch chain at Boston costs between 9 and 10 cents.

Mr. ROBERTS. Are you familiar with the size and quality of the chain that Mr. LOUD says is sold in the markets at 4 cents?

Admiral MANNEY. I do not know of first-class chain cables of first-class iron at such a price. The Lawson's cables and those of Hill's Pacific Line are more than 3 inches in diameter, larger than the navy chain cables. I am sure they cost more than 4 cents a pound. The Minnesota's, of that line, cost 5.43 cents per pound. I believe the statement that "the very best chain that can be bought in this country for use in the highest class ships is for about 4 cents per pound," is in error.

I submit, in consideration of the quality of the chain required for naval purposes, it ought to be manufactured in the Government yards, as is clearly proven by Admiral Manney's statement in reply to questions of the committee on pages 387 and 388, as follows:

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Now, you say that the contract work is not as good as that done in the yard?

Admiral MANNEY. Contract work that we have had done from the Lebanon Chain Works has shown up upon test to have the strength necessary to pass it. The method of welding the links is inferior to that employed at the yard. The yard uses the end weld; in the large commercial chains purchased the side weld is employed. This is objectionable, as the two sides of the link are then not symmetrical in strength. The part of the link which has been oftenest heated and pounded has not the same texture as the other part.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Does your test show inferiority in the manufacture of chains?

Admiral MANNEY. The breaks show where the weakest part is, and the links having the end weld have been found the stronger.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will they not weld them at the end if you demand it?

Admiral MANNEY. No; they state that they can not. It would increase the cost.

And further on the same page he replied as follows:

Mr. LOUD. I find in the last report that when they were short last year they went outside and bought large chains. They can be bought outside?

Admiral MANNEY. Those chains were made by contract. They were 2¾-inch cables. The method of making was inferior to the Government method, because a side weld was employed. The contractors would not undertake to make an end weld, and never have made an end weld; specifications had to be waived on the manufacture and material.

A similar statement in regard to the superior quality and price of manila rope as well as chains made in Government yards is made by Admiral Manney on page 389, in response to questions by the committee, as follows:

Mr. RIXEY. I understood you to say in the first part of your hearing that these chains were made at the Boston yard by the Government cheaper than outside.

Admiral MANNEY. Cheaper, in one sense, than can be bought outside and better finished—more durable. The 2¾-inch cables made in Boston cost 9½ cents per pound; the same sized cable made by contract costs 9¼ cents per pound.

Mr. RIXEY. I understood you to say "cheaper and better."

Admiral MANNEY. I did. Commercial chains to be equally strong will cost almost as much as the Government-made chain, and can not be expected to be as serviceable. The rope also is cheaper and better than private-made rope.

Mr. RIXEY. You say now that you make the rope cheaper?

Admiral MANNEY. We make all kinds of rope—wire, hemp, and manila. Our rope we consider better than outside rope. We know what it is. Quality considered, it is cheaper.

Mr. RIXEY. You say now that you can make rope cheaper than outside?

Admiral MANNEY. Of the same quality; yes.

Mr. RIXEY. Why is it that you can make rope cheaper than outside, but can not make the chains?

Admiral MANNEY. We buy material in each case. The rope is machine made; the chain cables are made by hand. They are especially heavy, difficult, and expensive to handle. Handmade articles are more expensive than similar ones made by machinery. The best chain iron in the market is bought to make cables. It is expensive, not only because of quality, but because of high cost of transportation. As to ropes, only the very highest grade of hemp and manila is bought by the Navy, and it is carefully inspected. Much of the manila and hemp that is sold in the market is not of the first quality, and especially is that the case with manila. The grade of manila used in the Boston-made rope is not put in commercial rope nor quoted unless "special grade" is asked for. Under the circumstances the ropes made at the Boston yard are believed to be superior, but although the material is of the best, freight and handling do not cost so much.

Mr. RIXEY. Still, Admiral, I do not see that that is a reason why you can make the rope cheaper and yet can not make the chain cheaper.

Admiral MANNEY. A principal reason for that is, as I stated, that the making of the rope is done by machinery and the making of the chain cables is hand work, and labor is expensive in the United States, and especially expensive in navy-yards. The difference of cost between the iron used for cables at Boston and that used in commercial cables is greater than the difference in cost between rope material used by the Government and private makers; also, there is a greater proportionate amount of labor employed in making cable than in making rope.

Also a similar statement in regard to wire rope, on page 384, as follows:

Mr. VREELAND. Are you making wire rope?
Admiral MANNEY. Yes, sir.
Mr. VREELAND. Where?
Admiral MANNEY. Boston.
Mr. VREELAND. Are you buying your wire rope, too?
Admiral MANNEY. No; we have not bought any wire rope, except possibly some special rope in an emergency.
Mr. VREELAND. Do you think you can manufacture it as cheaply as you can buy?
Admiral MANNEY. Cheaper, when quality is considered.
Mr. VREELAND. That is taking into consideration the investment in your plant. You do not take that into account, do you?
Admiral MANNEY. We consider it.

Admiral Manney also makes a similar statement as to anchors, on page 386, as follows:

The larger anchors made for the Government by outside parties are cast; the anchors made in the yard are of wrought iron. When you compare commercial anchors with chains or anchors made in the yard you are comparing cast with wrought metal. The heavy anchors which are made outside are of cast steel.

It is admitted that the cost of manufacturing in the navy-yard is somewhat higher. The reason for this is set forth in the Admiral's testimony, on page 388, as follows:

Admiral MANNEY. The labor is paid differently. In the private shops labor is paid by the hour, and in the naval shops the labor is paid by the day; and then there are allowances for leaves for employees that enormously increase the cost over what private establishments would have to pay. However, the cost of 2¾-inch cables at Boston is 9⅛ cents, and the cheapest contract chains yet received of the same size, 9¼ cents.

Therefore, if you propose to adopt this amendment, you are going to substitute lower standards. Now, let me point out that the last amendment, as offered by the gentleman from Ohio, puts the Department in this position, that if it is adopted it will close up the Government yards on the lines of material specified, because it provides that the Government can not manufacture unless they shall ask for bids, receive them, open, and award contracts and then receive and test the material. The Government must do all that, and it is only when that material can not be purchased lower than the present price of manufacture in the Government yards that the Government can proceed to manufacture at all. In other words, the amendment would close up the Government yard as far as manufacturing its own equipment is concerned, until the Government had received the bids.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. It only refers to chains and anchors.

Mr. McNARY. Not originally. It was a general amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a few minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McNARY] asks unanimous consent to continue his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. OLMSTED. I have no objection to that, Mr. Chairman, except I have a word to say on the subject, and I know that members of the committee want opportunity to say something, and do not want to be cut out.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Chairman, it is not my fault that they have not had an opportunity to speak. I will only take a few minutes, however. I want to say that the debate started originally on chains and anchors. Then it was made under the amendment, if I read it aright, to include everything in the way of equipment manufactured in the Government yards.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is fair to the gentleman to say that the amendment has modified——

Mr. McNARY. This is coming out of my time, and I can not afford it. If I had the time I would hear the gentleman. I say that under the original amendment of the gentleman from Ohio the Government can manufacture nothing, but must wait until it receives bids and tests the quality of the purchases. As modified it means to close up the Government yards on every article included in that amendment, and leaves it to the mercy of the private manufacturers to put up the price to any point they please after the Government yards are closed. Even if the private manufacturers bid low at first, experience teaches that when they have succeeded in closing the Government shops up will go the price and down will go the quality. This amendment means, if adopted, the closing of the shops at Boston, equipped at an expense of $103,000, and with additions and maintenance costing $56,000 more, and the dispersal of the trained force of skilled workmen who now turn out the finest goods made in this country.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words upon this subject. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] has referred to the fact that in the past some of the orders of the Government for chains have been filled by the Lebanon Chain Works. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] has made the assertion that these chains are made by a trust, and that if this amendment should be adopted the trust will put up the price to any figure it pleases. Now, Mr. Chairman, if there is anything on earth that is not a trust it is the Lebanon Chain Works. It has but a single plant and is not connected with any other. It does not own or control any other corporation and no other corporation owns or controls it. This concern operates rather in opposition to any and every trust. As I understand it, the bill as it now stands would prevent the Government from buying chains from the Lebanon Chain Works. The amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, if adopted, will permit the purchase of chains from this concern, provided it shall, as in the past, underbid its competitors. The gentlemen from Massachusetts who so strenuously oppose this amendment naturally desire to have the chains all manufactured at Boston, but what kind of a place is Boston to make iron or the products of iron as compared with Lebanon?

The Lebanon Chain Works are located within 5 miles of the famous Cornwall ore banks, and they are not owned or operated by any trust, either. They stand out there most strikingly in the midst of one of the most beautiful and fertile valleys in the world. The view from the summit reminds me something of the view from Stirling Castle. Then, again, these works are almost within sight of splendid limestone quarries and within 30 or 40 miles of the finest anthracite coal. I have not a dollar's worth of interest personally either in the ore banks or in the chain works, but I know something about them.

In these works the making of chains is a specialty, and they are admirably adapted to that purpose. Reference has been made here to the relative merits of side weld and end weld. Well, the Lebanon Chain Works can make side weld, end weld, or any other weld that anybody desires. They can produce as good chains as any other factory on earth. If I am not mistaken, they have turned out the longest and largest chain ever produced anywhere. I have seen it so stated. They have the best known chain-testing apparatus. The chains they have heretofore made for the Government have passed every Government test, and secured by chains from the Lebanon Chain Works the largest man-of-war may securely rest at anchor anywhere, either in or outside the harbor.

The laboring population of Lebanon is as sober, industrious, intelligent, and competent as can be found. The Lebanon Chain Works has no watered stock upon which to pay dividends; and with all these advantages can, of course, produce chains more cheaply than they can be produced in Boston. No private purchaser would think of going past Lebanon to Boston to buy chains. The item of freight alone in hauling the ore from the mines to Boston and the chains from Boston to the place where they are to be used would be very considerable. If the Government can buy chains cheaper at Lebanon than anywhere else, sound business economy requires that it shall not be deprived of that advantage.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, the anchors and chains made for the use of the Navy are made in the Boston Navy-Yard. The effect of this amendment, if it is adopted, will be to stop the work in the Government navy-yard until it can be ascertained at what price the private factories will furnish these chains.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. It does not affect anything but the chains?

Mr. RIXEY. It would stop everything that the amendment proposes to affect. Now, I can not yield just at this moment.

Mr. VREELAND. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. RIXEY. After a moment, but not now.

Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the result would be that possibly for the first year the private factories would underbid the Government in actual cost. The private factories could afford to make the chains for the first year or the first two years or the first three years at 50 per cent of their actual cost in order to force the Government out of the work. The effect of this amendment, if it prevails, will be to break up the manufacture of these chains at the Government navy-yard at Boston—not because they can be manufactured at less price, but because it is to the interest of the private factories to drive the Government out of the work, even if the private factories lose money for the first year or two.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: If this bill goes into effect, it will not go into effect for sixty days. Can not the Government advertise for bids in sixty days to find out whether we can make a log chain?

Mr. RIXEY. I have not time to reply to that at present. The effect of the adoption of this amendment can be seen when you understand the case to which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LILLEY] referred some time ago. He asked what analogy the purchase of powder had to the purchase of chains. I will tell him what it has. The Government has a very small factory at Indian Head. It can make 20 per cent of the powder the Navy uses, and it is compelled to buy powder from the private factories.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RIXEY. I can not yield.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. The gentleman quotes me.

Mr. RIXEY. If I can have additional time I will yield. The Government can only make 20 per cent of the powder we use and is compelled to go into the market to get the balance of it. While it costs at Indan Head 60 cents a pound, it costs to buy powder from the private factories 74 to 75 cents, and this committee yesterday refused to reduce it to 65 cents.

Stop the work at the Boston yard, put it out of the power of the Government to make its own chains, and you will be, in regard to chains, where we are to-day with reference to powder—at the mercy of the private factories. Just as soon as you take from the Government the power to protect itself you will see that the prices of these articles will begin to go up. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, it would be an unwise policy for us to shut up this shop. I heard all the testimony before the Naval Committee that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] heard, and that testimony did not impress me that there was any great difference in the matter of price; but I do know that the chief of that Bureau stated emphatically that the work done by the Government was better than anything that he could purchase in the open market. He said it would be unfortunate if we undertook to cripple the establishment at Boston, that it ought to be maintained, and that the Government had the right to have the very best material for its warships.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] did not offer any amendment before the committee such as he has offered to-day on this subject. It may be that he has received additional information since, but so far as the Naval Committee was concerned, there was no testimony which threw doubt upon the wisdom of continuing this work at the Boston Navy-Yard.

[The time of Mr. RIXEY having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended for one minute.]

Mr. RIXEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I should regret the adoption of this amendment, because I should regard it as a step backward. For years we have been contending, not that the Government should do all its work in a navy-yard, not that it should build all its ships in navy-yards, but simply that it should have the proper plants to protect itself against the great combinations which are being formed almost every month in this country.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But the gentleman's committee has already reported against building an armor-plate factory, has it not?

Mr. RIXEY. I think not. I have always voted in favor of building an armor-plate factory whenever the question was raised.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But the committee has voted against it.

Mr. RIXEY. And I would vote for it to-day, in order that the Government might protect itself against the trust which controls the armor plate. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. But the committee has always refused to adopt that recommendation, and the House has refused to adopt it.

Mr. RIXEY. That is correct.

Mr. GROSVENOR. So they say that armor plate, the finest work in the world, should be built in private plants, and log chains should be built in the Navy Department, because they are of a peculiar character.

Mr. ROBERTS. The Secretary of the Navy was authorized to establish an armor-plate factory if he could not get the armor at a price that suited him, and that brought the price down.

Mr. RIXEY. Ever since I have been a Member of Congress this House has been under the control of the Republican party, and it has refused to authorize an armor-plate factory, though it has been demonstrated here time and time again that the price charged was grossly excessive and the armor plate controlled by a trust.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. It seems to me he has introduced two entirely new features into the discussion. Now, he provides by his amendment as perfected, that the Department can not expend any of this appropriation in the manufacture of wire rope, cable, or anchors, until the Department ascertains whether it can purchase these same articles outside at a less price than it costs to make them in the navy-yards. The only effect of that amendment would be to close the rope walk, the wire mill, the anchor shop, and the chain shop on the 1st day of July, when this bill goes into effect, and keep those plants closed until the Government prepares its specifications, makes its advertisement for bids, inspects those bids, and finds whether it can or can not purchase this material outside cheaper than it can be made in the navy-yards. Now, what happens?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROBERTS. I can not yield. Pardon me, I do not wish to be discourteous, but I have only five minutes.

Now, what happens? The skilled force that the Government has gathered together, some of the very men that the gentleman from New York told us in that letter would have to be employed by outside people to make this Government chain, will leave the navy-yards. The Government loses them. Then suppose that three or four months afterwards it is discovered that the outside people can not make these articles up to the Government standard at less than it costs to make them in the yards. Then the Government tries to get together that force of skilled men, which it formerly had, to go on with the manufacture of those articles.

Now, what is the result of that? You stop the production of these chain cables and ropes that are needed to equip the ships that are now going into commission. As I said a little while ago, we are 11 miles behind in the matter of cables, and if you adopt this amendment, you will stop the production of cables for three or four months. But there is another alternative the Department can adopt under that amendment. The Naval Committee and Congress has, since I have had any knowledge of it, been endeavoring to prevent the Departemnts of this Government from going into the open market and making purchases without competitive bids being offered, and yet under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio those in charge of the Navy Department, on the 1st day of July, can go into the open market, because he says they can get the materials "by any other means they see fit." You are going to allow the Department to go in without competitive bids and make contracts for all those articles.

But suppose it is demonstrated as a result of the competitive bids that these chains can be purchased at an equal cost to those made in the Department, what result follows? These chains can not be delivered to the Government at the time the bids are opened. These private concerns have got to get equipped, they have got to go ahead and manufacture the chains; so that in any event if the amendment is adopted you are bound to stop the equipment of battle ships that are now going into commission, you are bound to stop the furnishing of the equipment of the ships that go into the yards from time to time, for four or five months and perhaps longer; longer if private manufacturers get the contract to furnish them, and four or five months anyway. I submit to this committee that it is not a wise thing to do because we are way behind now in the furnishing of these articles and there should not be one moment's delay if ships of the Nevy are to be equipped in a manner equal to the present state of efficiency.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, in response to the gentleman from Massachusetts, who challenged us to produce a certificate of efficiency, I hope he is satisfied with the proof of Lloyd's test that I have sent to the desk.

Mr. MCNARY. I am not satisfied, I will state to the gentleman. It does not show that it was made of the best iron, and Admiral Manney said that it would not come up to the satisfaction of the Navy Department.

Mr. LOUD. I call the gentleman's attention to the letter of the Eastern Ship Building Company, in which they say that all these things were tested to the full strength of Lloyd's inspection.

Mr. MCNARY. That is not up to the navy-yard standard.

Mr. LOUD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not attempted to lower the standard of material that goes into the ships of the Navy. I would not do it for a moment. I only say that material of the same strength and utility can be bought in the open market for one-half of what it is costing now.

As to superiority claimed for chain made in naval shops in Boston yard, the following letter will explain itself, and shows a deplorable weakness in quality of the 2¾-inch cables on U. S. battle ship Maine:

U. S. S. MAINE,
North River, New York, N. Y., May 9, 1906.

SIR: 1. In reference to your letter of May 3, 1906, to the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, asking for an excerpt from the log of this ship covering the subject of losing anchors, I have the honor to state that the records of the ship show that the following-mentioned cases of chain or triplet links parting had occurred prior to my taking command:

(a) In letting go the anchor on March 23, 1904, on the target range at Pensacola, Fla., one link of the "triplet" broke, and the anchor was recovered.

(b) While heaving in the starboard bower chain on July 8, 1904, at anchor off Corfu, Greece, it parted, and the anchor and 26 fathoms of chain were afterwards recovered. This was due to a defective link at about 26 fathoms.

(c) While heaving in at Marthas Vineyard on September 9, 1904, the chain came in without the anchor. The examination showed that the middle link of the bending-shackle triplet had broken across the weld. This anchor was lost, and no trace of its buoy could be found.

(d) While heaving in off Cape Henry, Va., on June 1, 1905, it was found that the second link of the port triplet had parted. The anchor was recovered.

2. Since I have taken command of the Maine the following-mentioned cases have occurred:

(e) In letting go the port anchor on the target range off Barnstable, Mass., on September 22, 1905, the chain parted at the outboard link of the triplet. The anchor was recovered.

(f) In letting go the port anchor in North River on May 4, 1906, the middle link of the triplet parted almost immediately after letting go and before the anchor had touched the bottom. The anchor has been recovered.

3. The anchor chain of this ship was manufactured at the Boston Navy-Yard.

Very respectfully,
N. A. NILES,
Captain, U. S. Navy, Commanding.

Hon. GEORGE A. LOUD, M. C.,
Tenth District, Michigan,
Committee on Naval Affairs, Washington, D. C.

Mr. GRAHAM. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact, as developed by the debate, that there are three independent concerns outside of the steel trust now making chains for private consumers and will probably be able to supply the Government with chains. There is one at Lebanon, one at Pittsburg, and another elsewhere.

Mr. LOUD. My investigation has been exhaustive, and I find a great number of chain factories that are able to compete in this matter and which are not tied up in any combination. I want to say further in regard to what has been said about chains about the end weld and the side weld——

Mr. VREELAND. If the gentleman will pardon me, I want to suggest that the bill as amended provides for the same standard as the Navy is now building, therefore that point is taken out; but I would be glad to hear the gentleman as to the effect it would have on the plant at Boston—whether or not it would close it up, as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. LOUD. In answer to that question I will say that they have the advantage of the outside manufacturer, because they have a plant costing half a million dollars furnished them, with nothing for deterioration, renewals, interest, taxes, insurance, or profits to charge against their output, while other firms have to allow for all these fixed charges against their output, and I can not understand why the naval shops can not, under these favoring conditions, compete on an even basis with the outside parties. If they can not compete on an even basis with the outside factory they ought to be closed up and let it be a lesson to other manufacturing interests supported by the Navy that they must get the cost down within a reasonable limit.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOUD. I will yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan if he does not think that the gentleman from Massachusetts has taken a little too seriously the position that the factory would have to stop on the 1st of July if this amendment was passed? Would not there be ample time between now and July 1 to get bids and let contracts?

Mr. LOUD. I want to say that there is no reason why that magnificent plant, furnished with all the latest machinery for making these articles, with skilled mechanics who can make them if they want to, has not plenty of time within which to make the test, and if they can make it equally cheap they are at perfect liberty to do so. In closing I desire to say that I have here the highest published authority upon chain making which can be found anywhere in the world, and that advocates the side welding of the chain, and I have here three letters upon the same subject from experts, all saying that the side-welded chain is the best. Those letters are as follows:

LEBANON, PA., March 28, 1906.

Hon. GEORGE A. LOUD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I understand that you are interested in information concerning the manufacture of chain as made in the Boston Navy-Yard. The writer is a practical chain maker, and during the year 1904 was employed in the Boston Navy-Yard making chain. I do not consider that the iron furnished by the Monongahela Iron and Steel Company, of Pittsburg, is the proper iron to use for chain making, for the reason that it is very hard to weld and does not run uniform. During the latter period of the time that I was employed there I made all of the chain samples for testing. The method of testing chain at the Boston Navy-Yard is entirely different from the way it is done in outside shops. In Boston the chain maker has the privilege of cutting out his own samples for testing.

I am at present employed by a chain manufacturing concern which has furnished large quantities of this chain to the United States Navy, part of which chain I have made. In this shop the test pieces are cut out of the chain at random by the Government inspector and pulled to destruction, and unless these test pieces stand the required strains the entire piece of chain from which the test piece was taken would be rejected. In the Boston Navy-Yard the chain was all welded on the end, whereas in this shop it was side welded, and in my opinion side-welded chain is superior to the end welded.

Yours, respectfully,
EDWARD MELLMAN.

LEBANON, PA., March 28, 1906.

Hon. GEORGE A. LOUD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I understand that you are interested in the subject of side-welded chain, and desire to give you some information on the subject.

In the year 1816 Sir Samuel Brown, a lieutenant in the royal navy of England, first invented the process of welding chain on the side. Ever since that time chain has been made successfully by the side-welding process, and the British Admiralty will not use any other but side-welded, as it has proven far superior to end-welded chain on larger sizes. In the year 1840 it was first made in Staffordshire, England, by the late Henry Pershouse Parkes, and since that time all the chain made there of large sizes for ship cables have been side-welded.

Yours, respectfully,
SYDNEY JOHNSON.

LEBANON, PA., March 28, 1906.

Hon. GEORGE A. LOUD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have recently received information which leads me to believe that a statement by myself in regard to the difference between welding chain on the end and on the side would be of interest to you. I am a practical chain maker, having been engaged in this business in England, as well as this country, for the past thirty years, and have had a wide experience.

Side-welded chains are far superior to end-welded chains for the reasons that end-welded chain is not so pliable, not so neat, and not so strong as the side-welded. I can remember when Brown & Lenox, in Wales, England, used to make all the side-welded chain for the British navy. Staffordshire, England, which is a noted place for chain making, could not compete with Wales, for the reason that they were welding their chain on the end and were compelled to change to the side-welding process, which has been demonstrated as superior to the end-welded. Since making this change, nearly all of the British navy cable chain is made in Staffordshire, and the British navy will not have any chain welded on the end over 1¾-inch size. Side-welded chain has been made in England for more than fifty years, and during that period has proven to be far superior to end-welded.

Yours, truly,
HERBERT FORREST.

I have approached this business proposition from a wholly unprejudiced and unbiased standpoint, for I am one of the fortunate members of the Naval Committee having no navy-yard, naval station, or naval interest; nor any manufactory of any material under discussion in my district or my State.

I have no relatives, friends, or acquaintances interested in any such manufactory, and all the information which I have given to you in unstinted measure has been obtained upon my own initiative from absolute strangers.

My only motive in taking up the subject is to call to your attention this illustration of extravagant and needless expenditure of a large sum of money yearly, thereby diverting and wasting a portion of the large and generous appropriation by Congress of about $100,000,000 annually, which should be used in the economical upbuilding and maintenance of a grand navy, which I hope shall be second to that of no other nation in the world, save England. I trust the amendment under discussion will prevail. [Great applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for the pending amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended in the manufacturing in any Government navy-yard of any chains, anchors, or cordage which can be obtained in the free markets of the country at a less cost than the manufacture of the same article will cost in the navy-yards by bids at the solicitation of the Department or in such other manner as the Department may choose: And provided further, That all such articles shall be of a standard of quality to be fixed by the Navy Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute for the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LOUD) there were—ayes 76, noes 72.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. LOUD and Mr. ROBERTS were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 73.

So the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the original amendment as amended by the substitute.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ROBERTS) there were—ayes 71, noes 66.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LOUD and Mr. ROBERTS were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes 76.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Coal and transportation: Purchase of coal and other fuel for steamers and ships' use, and other equipment purposes, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling the same, and for the general maintenance of naval coaling depots and coaling plants, $3,750,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. I observe that this appropriation has been increased over the appropriation for the current appropriation $1,000,000. The Navy Department at the beginning of this session estimated a deficiency of $1,250,000 for the current year.

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. And Congress has allowed them $50,000 in addition to what was appropriated. I obtained the impression in the hearings on the urgent deficiency bill that it was the policy of the Navy Department to stock up to the maximum limit all of the coaling stations that the Government owned, and that that was the reason they felt there would be such a deficiency in the current appropriation for coal. I desire to ask the gentleman whether this increase of $1,000,000 is for the purpose of carrying out that policy, or whether this increase is necessary to maintain only a reasonable necessary quantity of coal at these different coaling stations for necessary current consumption?

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, that is my understanding, that this is simply for the Navy during the coming fiscal year and not to stock up a large amount of coal at any of these coaling stations. Of course there will have to be more or less reserve in the Philippines, because we have the Asiatic fleet over there. The reason why there is an increase this year is due to the fact that we have more vessels in commission, and, as the gentleman will see, from the fact that the Department is asking for a deficiency this year, if the same number of vessels are kept in commission it will require a larger appropriation for coal. I may say that this item is made larger by reason of the fact that the shipping of our coal has been done in American bottoms. That is costing from $350,000 to $400,000 a year more than if the coal were shipped in foreign bottoms. That was done in pursuance of an act of Congress approved April 28, 1904, compelling all naval supplies to be shipped in American bottoms. I think that this appropriation is needed this year and that we can not safely reduce it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say, Mr. Chairman, my only purpose was to ascertain whether or not the committee, of which the gentleman is at the head—the Naval Committee—agreed with the Navy Department in respect to the necessity of stocking up our coaling stations to their maximum capacity——

Mr. FOSS. Oh, no——

Mr. TAWNEY. The coaling stations in the United States. If that was so, I should have moved to reduce this amount. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 12, after the word "dollars," insert: "Provided, That no part of the amount hereby appropriated shall be expended for transportation of coal between ports in the United States on the Atlantic coast and on the Gulf of Mexico and ports in the Philippine Islands at a greater rate than $5 a ton."

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the hearings on the urgent deficiency bill it was ascertained that prior to the passage of the act of April 28, 1904, the highest price paid for the transportation of coal to the Philippine Islands was $4.87½ a ton. Since the passage of the act of April 28, 1904, which required coal and supplies for the Navy to be transported in American vessels, the price has gone up to about $7.50 a ton. In that act provision is made that, in case the prices are excessive or unreasonable, the President of the United States may direct that coal and supplies be transported in other vessels than American vessels. The Secretary of the Navy, in his report for the present year, speaking of the law requiring the transportation of coal especially in American vessels, says:

That the statute requiring the transportation of naval stores in American bottoms, however, tends to none of these ends—

That is, to the building up of the merchant marine and training of seamen—and, in fact, seems only to cause trouble and expense to the Government, with no offsetting advantage. I strongly recommend its repeal.

The Secretary of the Navy, in his statement before the Committee on Naval Affairs, speaking of the necessity of repealing this act—that is, the act requiring the transportation of naval supplies in American bottoms—says this:

That is pretty well stated in my report. I have only to say this: I can not see any good excepting to owners of ships. I do not think it promotes the building of any American ship or the training of any American sailor. It has very largely increased the cost of the transportation of our coal. So far as the transportation of naval stores is concerned, the law is almost ineffective. It is difficult to get, very frequently, the American ship to transport them. Of course you can do that with coal, because it is not an urgent matter—not a matter of extreme urgency to get it there at a fixed date; but the increased cost is something very startling—something like double.

Then, after an interruption as to where the law originated, the Secretary of the Navy continues:

They are for everything excepting coal, and they are very high and mighty on the coal question. They fix rates that are practically—well, not prohibitory, because we have to get the coal, but which are enormously high. All I want to say in this connection is that I don't want it to be assumed from my recommendation in that report that I am opposed to a measure which would tend to promote the merchant marine. I have only to deal with the so-called "ship-subsidy" measures or proposals from a naval standpoint, and from a purely naval standpoint there is a great deal to be said in favor of some such bill as that; but I don't see that this bill amounts to anything excepting a heavy increase of expense.

The hearings developed that coal costing $360,000 to purchase in this country cost over $900,000 to transport to the Philippine Islands. In this appropriation bill an increase of $1,000,000 is recommended for the purchase of coal and transportation. The Secretary of the Navy says that the requirement to carry this coal in American bottoms has resulted merely in doubling the cost of transportation. I wish to call attention to the fact that it seems very extraordinary that the Secretary should continue to use American bottoms for this purpose. He says that while the price is not prohibitory it is very excessive, and yet in the law passed April 28, 1904, it is specifically provided that—

American bottoms shall be used unless the President shall find that the rate of freight charges by said vessels are excessive and unreasonable, in which case contract shall be made under the law as it now exists.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is not only to permit the payment of a reasonable and a fair charge for the transportation of coal for the Navy from this country to the Philippine Islands, but it is also designed to prevent the extortionate prices that now prevail. I know of no better authority upon this question than the Secretary of the Navy. It is not possible to repeal on this appropriation bill the law to which he refers, but it is possible to so limit the price to be paid for the transportation of coal as to effect practically the same result. The fact that prior to the passage of this law, as was shown in the hearings to which I have called attention, coal could be transported, at the outside, at $4.87 a ton makes it seem that $5 is a reasonable price to fix.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Under this law as it is now on the statute books, is it not in the power of the Secretary of the Navy, if extortionate prices are asked, to send the coal in foreign bottoms?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It gives that power to the President; but the President is a busy man. He has a great many duties. He can not have knowledge of all of these things, and it seems to me, in view of the Secretary's statement that the prices are enormously high, that that law has resulted in nothing except in a heavy increase in expense, and that the increased cost is something very startling, something like double, and that despite all the coal is transported in these vessels, it is necessary for us to do something to relieve the situation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The object of my question was this: If we adopt this amendment it will not shut off the opportunity for carrying coal, but it is merely declaratory of the opinion of this House that more than $5 would be exorbitant, and if American bottoms charge more than that, the Secretary of the Navy then could send it in foreign ships.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true.

Mr. FOSS. I have the law right here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have it right here, too.

Mr. FOSS it says:

Provided, That no greater charges be made by such vessels for transportation of articles for the use of said Army and Navy than are made by such vessels for transportation of like goods for private parties or companies.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And that if the prices are excessive or unreasonable, the President can direct that the coal or supplies can be carried in foreign bottoms. But in spite of the existence of that law, the coal for the Navy has been carried in American bottoms; and the Secretary of the Navy, both in his report and in his testimony before the gentleman's committee, insists that the increase in cost has been "startling;" that the prices, while not prohibitory, because they have had the coal carried, is yet "enormously high," and that the law should be repealed. Yet in the face of those statements and expressions of opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, no action has been taken by the Executive to remedy the conditions. I believe it is due to the fact that the President, as I have already stated, has a multitude of duties. He can not keep informed of all these different matters.

Mr. FOSS. I understand that the Navy Department is going to take this matter up, and they will not pay any such exorbitant charges.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, the gentleman has no objection to some limitation upon the price. I am not particular about——

Mr. FOSS. We can not repeal this law here on this bill in this way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We can fix the limit of price, and if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] will suggest some other price than $5 I am willing to accept it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask him and the other gentlemen of the committee what has been the history of this transportation? Have excessive prices been charged?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is what the Secretary of the Navy says, and the fact is that prior to the passage of the law the highest price, according to the statement made to the Committee on Appropriations, was $4.87½ per ton. After the passage of the law it has gone as high as $7.50 a ton.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I was interrogating the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss], the chairman of the committee, with the view of getting some information as to these charges. The gentleman from New York states that prior to the limitation fixed in the law the charges were less than $5 a ton, namely, $4.87½. I understood him to say that since then the charges have been advanced until they are $7 or more per ton.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has gone as high as $7, but has varied.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Has gone as high as $7 a ton?

Mr. FOSS. That is, in American bottoms.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not that strike the gentleman as, if the charge was reasonable and fairly remunerative, that the advance to $7 a ton, more than 40 per cent, is extortion?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. What was the rate charged the Government when carried in foreign bottoms?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am trying to elicit information from the chairman of the committee on that very point.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I would say to the gentleman that it was not only in excess of $7, but in excess of $8 in 1901.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then, if that be true, Mr. Chairman, we want some limitation that will protect the interest of the Government both from the foreign and American ships, it seems. We ought to have a competition that comes from the encouragement of American ships, but puts a limitation upon their greed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that the gentleman from New Jersey has confounded two facts. I believe what he said applies to the transportation of other supplies. This item relates to coal. Prices for carrying other supplies were quite high in 1901. But my recollection is that for carrying coal, for which there were a greater number of vessels available, that it did not reach the prices mentioned by him. This amendment merely applies to coal, the transportation of coal, and not the transportation of other supplies.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I will just say, for the benefit of the gentleman from New York, that the statement he made is based upon the same authority as the statement made by me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I suppose it is the chief of the Bureau, but I do not know. He gives in his report the average price in 1901. I do know this, however, that the Secretary of the Navy has stated to the gentleman's committee that extortionate prices are now being charged.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Extortionate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. He says practically that: "They fix rates that are practically, while not prohibitory, because we have got the coal, but they are enormously high." And he said at another place: "The cost is something very startling, something like double." And he said in another place: "I do not see that this bill amounts to anything except a heavy increase in expense." I submit that whatever would be the proper reasonable price, we should limit the Department to that price. The President has under the law the power to use foreign bottoms when the prices are unreasonable or excessive in American bottoms. Not having exercised that power in the past, it seems to me that we should fix a price beyond which the Department should not go in the use of American bottoms.

Mr. FOSS. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman, in view of the fact that the President has that power, in the case of excessive charges or unreasonable charges, to ship coal under the law as it previously existed, why is that not sufficient? Why put in this limitation when you have a limitation by law?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the time of the gentleman from Illinois, I will say this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FOSS. If we could put a limitation upon them there, we might put it by a law for the coming year, so as to practically prevent the shipping of coal to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We would only fix a reasonable limitation and regulate the price of transportation.

Mr. FOSS. If you put any limitation whatever upon it, as the gentleman from New Jersey said, like in 1901, in foreign bottoms it was $8, if I remember aright.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSS. Now, what we want is to get the coal out there for the ships, and we do not want to put any limitation that will shut that possibility out. I have no particular love for this line of business.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not want to cripple the naval service in any way, but I understood the gentleman from New York to read from a communication of the Secretary of the Navy, or his testimony before the committee, that the charges that had been exacted had been enormously high.

Mr. FOSS. But under this law the President can remedy that evil.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But under the practice it has not been done. It is the right of the President, but he is so much occupied with his multitudinous duties that perhaps he has not been able to give his attention to it and has not been able to reach it.

Mr. FOSS. Oh, after a while he will probably reach the matter.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that the members of the committee are laboring under a wrong impression. I am not in favor of permitting the Navy Department to suffer extortion, either in the carrying of coal or in the obtaining of any other articles. The report of the chief of the Bureau of the price paid for carrying coal from the Atlantic coast to Manila and the Hawaiian Islands is made every year, and for a period of seven years ending June 30, 1905, when for the major part of the time the coal was carried in foreign bottoms, the average price for those years was $6.49. A large proportion of the reduction of that price was made in the year 1904, when the foreign bottoms, cognizant of proposed legislation, evidently for that reason, reduced the price per ton for transportation, just as they are to-day offering to carry this coal at a less figure than they would if they had the command of the market themselves. I do not believe it is wise for the committee to adopt this amendment. If, however, the committee deem it wise to relieve the President of the discretionary power in this act, or to relieve him in a degree from the pressure that may be brought upon him, it would seem to me to be more wise for that limitation of this appropriation to be made on the line of percentages of increased cost of freight, either in foreign or American bottoms, so that at any time the President or the Secretary of the Navy might have more liberty in the carrying of coal. But even that, in my judgment, is dangerous, for the reason that if we do have any trouble in those waters, as everybody knows, every foreign bottom will refuse to carry a particle of coal for us, and we shall be dependent upon American bottoms. It would be wiser to repeal the law rather than to put a limitation upon this arm of the Government service.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, Congress saw fit in 1904 to provide that our coal carried to the Philippine Islands should be carried in American ships. The wisdom of that law was left to the membership of Congress. If I recollect rightly, there was not much opposition to the measure. Of course, it costs more money to carry coal in American ships than it does in foreign ships. American sailors are paid more money than foreign sailors are paid. There is not, however, any attempt to maintain one price for carrying this coal. The witness who appeared before the committee, and who was questioned quite closely (as gentlemen will see if they desire to follow the hearing), testified in answer to a question:

Do various American shipping companies bid for the contract?
Every shipowner in the United States of whom we have knowledge is asked to make an offer.
As a rule, do many of them make offers?
Many do.

Mr. Chairman, if the price is limited to $5 or $6 per ton, it will have the effect, of course, not only of taking from the Secretary of the Navy discretionary power to fix the rate on coal, but at the same time it may deprive our coal depots in the Philippine Islands and elsewhere of fuel that is absolutely necessary for our ships during the coming year. I believe that the Department is not well satisfied with the act of Congress of April, 1904. I believe, from what I have learned, that the Department would consider it much better if the discretion had been left in it to employ either foreign or American bottoms to haul this coal.

The committee that passed upon this item had nothing whatever to do with that subject. We do believe that quite a large sum is charged for this service, about $7 per ton as against $5 charged, perhaps, the year before. But to repeat what I said, if you limit the price we may not get the coal until this law is repealed. One step further. I know that it must be in the minds of gentlemen who are inquiring as to the advisability of the adoption of this amendment offered by the gentleman from New York: What is the occasion for this increase in price of carrying the coal? Principally this, that these American bottoms have no loads to carry back. They put the coal in at Newport News, take the long sail down the Atlantic, across the Pacific, and land their loads at Manila, and come back empty, because they do not have any trade this way. Therefore the Department informs us that in making these bids they must bid on both ways. Whose fault is that?

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I shall be greatly pleased to yield.

Mr. PERKINS. Is not that equally true of the foreign bottoms?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. No.

Mr. PERKINS. Wherein is the difference?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Admiral Manney testified that they carry coal to the Philippines and come back loaded; that there is a good deal of trade the other way.

Mr. PERKINS. Then why do not the American boats come back loaded?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Because the trade is not this way. The trade is to England and other ports where the foreign ships sail. I hope my friend will not press me particularly. I should like to answer his questions specifically, for I am not sufficiently well informed as to trade. We could do no better than to take the statement of competent gentlemen, and that statement we accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania answer one question, which he certainly can answer, because it is asking his own judgment; does he individually think it is wise to continue on the statute books the provision that now stands there compelling the Government to use American bottoms for the transportation of this coal?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, that is a pretty hard question to answer. I am an American citizen——

Mr. PERKINS. We all are.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania (continuing). And as long as I am an American citizen I shall be willing to pay the American sailor a little more than I would the foreigner. I believe, although I am not well informed—I am not an expert—that $7 is quite a large price to pay for carrying coal, and I base my judgment largely on the statement of those better informed than I am. But the question is, What is our remedy? I feel sure that there is a disposition in the Department to work out the solution. I do know that it is the determination to make every effort to get our coal hauled to the Philippines for less money than it is now being hauled. I am not willing, I will say to the gentleman from New York, to concede that I will vote to repeal that act of Congress, to turn over the carrying of coal as against our small merchant marine to foreign ships and put the foreign sailor in competition with the American sailor. I believe that if our trade becomes established in the Philippine Islands, and as the eastern trade may become expanded in extent, this coal may be hauled for less money. There is no criticism offered against the American shipowner that he is attempting to gouge the Government. They have, as I said before, nothing to bring this way, and of course the merchantman thinks he ought to have something on that account to pay him for the performance of his service.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is not the fact that you do not bring any load back mainly due to the fact that the Republican party keeps the tariff wall between the Philippine Islands and the United States, and that they can not bring anything back?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I hope that during the present session of Congress the act that passed this House may become a law. [Applause.] I may say that I do not think I am less Republican to express that wish. For the Filipino people I am willing to let down the bars, but in favor of the foreigner never; I would go to defeat first.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will pardon me, I have so much confidence in the gentleman's opinion on this matter that I would like to ask him if he does not regard the hope that he just spoke of as an iridescent hope? [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Well, having the same regard and confidence in the judgment of my friend from Mississippi, I will ask him whether he has any hope of the passage of that bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have long ceased to have any hope that common sense of a Democratic character would come from the legislative branch not far from here. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. My hope is that the gentleman will yet be saved, and this because of my great liking for him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask for just one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I believe it would be a mistake to put this limit on, for the reason that it might, while the act of Congress stands in the way, interfere with the delivery of coal in the Philippine Islands. I will not contend for any sort of combination that will take from the Government what the Government ought not to pay. We are not well informed as to what the future may show, but we are well satisfied, I think, that the Department is endeavoring to work out a solution, and it is not a comfortable one under the circumstances. [Laughter.]

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There was no apologist before the committee for this condition in regard to shipping coal to the Philippine Islands. Every representative of the Government who came before the committee expressed his regret that the law existed requiring the coal to be shipped in American bottoms. The gentleman from New York has read what the Secretary of the Navy stated before the committee. The Secretary thought this matter of so much importance that he also referred to this subject in his annual report, from which I will read:

In connection with the estimates for the Bureaus of Equipment and Supplies and Accounts, my attention has been called to the very unsatisfactory working of the law requiring the shipment of supplies for the Navy in American bottoms. It has been found altogether impracticable to make such shipments in connection with most naval stores, and in other cases, more especially with regard to coal, the additional cost to the Government thereby caused has been enormous. With the economical or legal aspects of a subsidy to our merchant marine this Department has no concern, but there can be no doubt that, from a purely naval standpoint, much may be said in favor of such a subsidy. With proper safeguards it might secure us a useful reserve of seamen and provide us with scouts, commerce destroyers, supply ships, transports, and colliers, which might be of great value in case of war. The statute requiring transportation of naval stores in American bottoms, however, tends to none of these ends, and, in fact, seems to cause only trouble and expense to the Government, with no compensating advantage. I strongly recommend its repeal.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Is that a repeal of the law?

Mr. RIXEY. The Secretary said, "I strongly recommend its repeal." Now, the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], if adopted, will operate as a practical repeal of that law so far as coal is concerned, and for this reason: The law itself provides that if the price is exorbitant and unreasonable the President has the power to have it carried under the law as it existed at the time that the new law was passed. The adoption of this amendment will be a statement that anything in excess of $5 is exorbitant, and will amount to a request to the President to exercise the discretion vested in him by the law and authorize coal to be carried as it was under the old law. It is perfectly plain that that is the proper course to pursue, and the amendment of the gentleman from New York should be adopted. I desire to state here that, having heard the Secretary's opinion before the committee and having heard the Bureau chief's testimony there, I am satisfied that the Navy Department would welcome a limitation upon this bill practically repealing the requirement of the new law as to coal transportation. In that one item for transportation of coal in one year to the Philippine Islands it cost the Government $300,000 more than it would upon open and free competition.

Mr. FOSS. Does the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] make the $5 applicable to foreign bottoms as well as to American bottoms, or simply to American bottoms?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the amendment would prevent this being paid to any ship; but if the gentleman will permit me I am going to ask to be permitted to substitute the sum of $6 for the sum of $5.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to provide in his amendment that it be made applicable to both conditions, so that if it is not carried under present law the President will have the right to have it carried under the old law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the law the President has the right to correct it.

Mr. FOSS. Under the law he can correct it to-day. Why not leave it in that way instead of attempting to fix a limitation which might absolutely shut out all coal for the Philippines?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The trouble is that he has failed to do this.

Mr. FOSS. The Secretary of the Navy says himself——

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say to my friend that this is but a repetition of the discussion which took place last year on this bill in reference to this item.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, when the naval bill for 1906 was up last year there was a similar motion made in regard to this item, and the same plea was entered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss], that the President had the power to correct it; but the fact remains that it has not been corrected and the failure to correct is costing the Government $300,000 a year. The probability is the President has never heard of it, but if this limitation is now placed here or some other like limitation is placed on the bill indicating the wish of Congress and the opinion of Congress it will bring some action by the executive branch of the Government, and I think the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am very much in favor of the motion offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. I do not think Members of the House can attach too much importance to one fact, which is that, as I think, we are getting to be "a government by scolding." Instead of enforcing the laws upon the statute books and exercising the discretions that are vested in various Departments and the President, we are getting so that we take it out in coming before the committees of the House or the House itself and scolding about the very things which might be cured without scolding. The gentleman from New York has read the testimony of the Secretary of the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy scolds about this matter. He tells about the abuse and he tells about how the Navy is frightfully exploited in the freight charges upon the coal. Yet it turns out that there is a discretion vested in the President by law to avoid this very evil and that the Secretary of the Navy, by bringing it to the attention of the President, if the President had done his duty, and presumably he would have done it, could have prevented the necessity of any motion like the one which the gentleman from New York now offers.

What is left to us, the legislative branch? If we vest in the Executive a discretion to prevent the Treasury from being exploited by selfish interests and that discretion be not exercised, then there is nothing left for us to do except to pass further legislation making clear our will and fixing a point beyond which the charges must not go and at which the exercise of the discretion in the Executive becomes mandatory and must be exercised. The motion of the gentleman from New York does that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That an act to require the employment of vessels of the United States for public purposes, approved April 28, 1904, shall not apply to the expenditure of this appropriation.

Mr. FOSS. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the gentleman makes the point of order on the ground that it is a change of existing law, although he did not so state?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What I have to say against the point of order is this, Mr. Chairman: This is an appropriation for the expenditure of Government money for coal. It is within the power of Congress to limit the expenditure as it sees fit, just as the proposition of the gentleman from New York is a limitation on the expenditure providing that it shall not exceed $5 for each ton.

Now, this is a limitation in the expenditure in the sense that it shall not go under that law. I admit I am not clear myself as to the parliamentary situation of this amendment, but I offer it as a limitation. Possibly it may go further than that and be purely a repeal of law, but before the gentleman from Illinois insists on his point of order I want to call the attention of this House to this fact: He is objecting to the amendment of the gentleman from New York on the ground that you are tying the hands of the Secretary of the Navy so if an emergency comes he can not act; he can not go over $5 a ton. Now, the Secretary of the Navy, in his hearing before the Naval Committee, has stated to the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of this great committee, and to the members of his committee that the increase caused in transportation of coal by reason of this law has been something startling, and that he favors a repeal of the law. Now, under those circumstances here is a limitation which I offer, if the gentleman does not insist upon the point of order, that does not repeal the law permanently, but repeals it so far as this particular provision is concerned. It unties the hands of the Secretary of the Navy, gives him a full authority to experiment under this appropriation, and determine whether or not he can get this coal shipped to foreign ports of the Government at a reasonable compensation, if you remove this law that at present ties his hands. Now, gentlemen on the committee object to the proposition of limiting the cost. There is no limitation here. It will leave it open for him in his discretion to determine whether he will ship the coal in foreign bottoms or in American bottoms, but it will do away with the fact that a few American vessels have increased the cost of transportation, as he says, to something that is startling. That is not my language; that is the language of the Secretary of the Navy. Now, under those circumstances is not it the duty of this House to relieve him of that trouble, give him the opportunity to save this difference of from $5 to $7 for each ton of coal that is shipped? The testimony in the report shows that before this law was enacted the highest price that was paid for carrying coal to the Philippine Islands was under $5 a ton.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Oh, no; I beg your pardon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, that is the statement of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Admiral Manney's report is it was advanced up to $8.63.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the statement made before the Committee on Appropriations on the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I am taking his report made to the Secretary of the Navy and by him published.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from New York states——

Mr. RIXEY. Here is the statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Virginia hands me the hearings, and I will read what Admiral Manney did say:

During the same year, when the markets were practically the same, the prices paid for foreign bottoms were from $4 a ton to $4.87 a ton to Manila. The cost of shipping in American steamers, which was the kind of tonnage that had been employed before, was $7 per ton to $7.50.

Now, that is what Admiral Manney says in the hearings.

You have a law on the statute book that has increased the cost of transportation of this coal from $4.87, the highest, to $7 and $7.50 a ton, and the Secretary of the Navy stands here in his report requesting that that be repealed, and I say it is the duty of this House to free his hands and give him a chance to act in the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist upon his point of order?

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I do insist upon the point of order. In my judgment it is a change of existing law. The law referred to is that, I think, approved April 24, 1904. Now, this act was reported from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and came before this House and was passed, and it seems to me that if this law is to be repealed, which applies not only to coal, but to all Army and naval stores, it ought to come in properly before this House and be considered and be repealed, and I am not sure I will not vote for its repeal if it is properly brought before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Division, Mr. Chairman!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 58.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of the amount hereby appropriated shall be expended in transporting coal between the ports of the United States on the Atlantic coast and the Gulf of Mexico and the ports in the Philippine Islands at a greater cost than $6 a ton.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, in what way does that change it?

Mr. SLAYDEN. It raises the limit of dollars.

Mr. FOSS. I call for a vote on it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Division, Mr. Chairman!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 56.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Tellers, Mr. Chairman!

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. Foss and Mr. SLAYDEN as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, League Island, Pa.: To continue retaining wall about reserve basin, $10,000; sewer system, extensions, $5,000; dredging and filling in Delaware water front, to continue, $15,000; fire-protection system, extensions, $5,000; extension of reserve basin, to continue dredging, $50,000; building for bathing, examination of recruits, and disinfection of clothing, $10,000; electric capstan for dry dock No. 1, $3,000; central heating system, $10,000; in all, navy-yard, League Island, $108,000.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do it for the purpose, Mr. Chairman, of asking unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD. I made three or four different statements at different times and read certain documents, and I ask leave to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend briefly and revise my remarks.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a similar request.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the several requests will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that these extensions are to be on the bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; certainly. I suppose that in the Committee of the Whole House, no other leave can be given.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Washington, D. C.: Paving, to extend, $5,000; underground conduit system, to extend, $5,000; railroad system, to extend, $5,000; heating system, extension, $5,000; water system, to extend, $10,000; yard wall, to complete, $20,000; extension and improvements, telephone and fire-alarm systems, $3,000; extension of gas plant, $10,000; purchase of land west of yard, to complete, $200; in all, navy-yard, Washington, $63,200.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the section, but I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] for the purpose of moving that the committee do now rise.

Mr. FOSS. Would not the gentleman like to offer his amendment to-night?

Mr. RIXEY. I can put it in in the morning. It will take some time.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the motion that the committee do now rise been put to the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been submitted and carried. The committee is waiting for the Speaker.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRUMPACKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill—the naval appropriation bill—H. R. 18750—and had come to no resolution thereon.

SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to read this telegram. It is a very important matter.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. To read a telegram.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to read a telegram. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee (reading)—

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., May 9, 1906.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Thank you sincerely for your efforts to secure drawback on imported building material. It is absolutely necessary, as already combinations are being formed to advance prices, to the serious detriment of property owners and home builders.

J. J. MOORE & Co.

[Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

That is the second telegram of thanks I have received from San Francisco people, and I want Congress to do for the San Francisco people at least as much as Congress did for the victims of the Chicago fire. And by way of extending my remarks I insert the following:

SAN FRANCISCO, April 25, 1906.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
Washington, D. C.:

Please mail us a copy of the customs relief bill.

C. D. BUNKER & Co.,
Post-Office Box 2564.

I sent copies of the bill (H. R. 18527) I introduced April 23 and the Madden-Cullom resolution, No. 142, and wrote C. D. Bunker & Co. May 2, and on May 7 received in reply this wire:

A thousand thanks for your sympathy and help. We need them both.

C. D. BUNKER & Co.

I have no personal acquaintance with Moore & Sons or Bunker & Co.—never heard of them before they wrote me, as here shown.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 5891. An act to authorize the South and Western Railway Company to construct bridges across the Clinch River and the Halston River, in the States of Virginia and Tennessee;

S. 5890. An act to authorize the South and Western Railroad Company to construct bridges across the Clinch River and Halston River, in the States of Virginia and Tennessee;

S. 5943. An act to authorize the Minnesota, Dakota and Pacific Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Missouri River;

S. 5572. An act to amend section 4348 of the Revised Statutes, establishing great coasting districts of the United States;

S. 1975. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Dugger;

S. 2801. An act to withhold from sale a portion of Fort Brady Military Reservation, at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich.;

S. 5537. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to allot homseteads to the natives of Alaska;

S. 5683. An act to provide for the removal of derelicts and other floating dangers to navigation;

S. 3436. An act to provide for the settlement of a claim of the United States against the State of Michigan for moneys held by said State as trustee for the United States in connection with the St. Marys Falls Ship Canal; and

S. 3522. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction and maintenance of roads, the establishment and maintenance of schools, and the care and support of insane persons in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved January 27, 1905.

SENATE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 4956. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon at Versailles, in the State of Kentucky—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. R. 47. Joint resolution granting condemned cannon for a statue to Governor Stevens T. Mason, of Michigan—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAYNE. A parliamentary inquiry. If the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening, will the only order of business be the bill for revising the code of criminal procedure?

The SPEAKER. Under the special order that would be the only business that will be in order.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I move that the House do now take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention to the fact, before this is voted upon, that I think this bill ought to be reprinted. Now, according to the legend of the bill, the existing law is printed in roman and the changes are printed in italics. On a slight examination of the bill, I find that a great many changes have been made with nothing at all to indicate what they are. Now, whether it is a mistake of the printer simply, or somebody else, I do not know.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks it necessary.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You had better have it reprinted.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I do not think that exists to any considerable extent, showing what the gentleman referred to. I think we have exercised a great deal of care. Of course, I refer to the Member who has it in charge and the printer.

Mr. DE ARMOND. What I refer to is this, Mr. Speaker: We are told that matter printed in roman is the old law and the changes are in italics. Now, in half a dozen or a dozen instances, looking over this matter slightly, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] and I found that the law as printed in this bill is not the law as printed in the statutes. How far these changes are material, or whether they are material or immaterial, of course, it would take considerable examination to find out.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman contend that they are not the laws that appear in the Revised Statutes, or does he mean that they are not existing law as amended by subsequent statutes, which amendments are existing law found in the Supplement to the Revised Statutes and in the Statutes at Large?

Mr. DE ARMOND. What I mean is that the committee has changed the phraseology in some instances. Take the punishment for treason. The statute, I think, provides that the punishment shall be, among other things, imprisonment at hard labor. The committee has left "hard labor" out. Now, whether the committee has done the like of that in other instances there is nothing to indicate. It is printed as the existing law, and there are a great many sections which ought to be corrected in the printing before the House goes into consideration of this bill.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to say that change is covered absolutely by a general provision explaining that we have stricken out from all punishment the words "hard labor," because that is entirely provided for in another way—in a general provision, a provision that covers entirely that feature of it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Well, that is only one instance, and I merely called attention to it. I do not think that is the only change; in fact, I am quite sure that changes have been made that are not indicated. I am sure that what purports to be, according to this print, existing law, in a great many instances will be found not to be the existing law.

Mr. PAYNE. As I understand, the session for this evening would be simply for the purpose of explaining the bill, and these questions might be decided later after conference between the two gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Missouri.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think really we ought to have the bill in proper form before we do anything about it.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the bill is in proper form. The point the gentleman has made is covered by a general provision. A reprint of the bill would necessarily leave it in exactly the form it is now. Other changes of this kind exist. For instance, wherever there was a minimum punishment provided that minimum punishment has been stricken out and the change fully covered and explained by a general provision. We have given ample, and I believe complete, explanation of the reason why this was done; and I believe any reprint of the bill should produce it just exactly in that form. Now, the only thing that would be changed would be, perhaps, a modification in the statement at the head of the bill explaining that that kind of a change was not always indicated by italics, but was fully covered by a general provision fully explained in the bill. Anybody reading that could tell what was existing law and what was suggested as an alteration and a change.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes; but anybody could not tell by reading one of these provisions, without going to the statute and comparing it, whether the provision as printed in the bill is as the law appears in the statute or is not as it appears in the statute.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the two gentlemen do not seem to be getting any nearer together. I must insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House now take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 66, noes 40.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-one Members, less than a quorum.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the chairman of the commission created to procure a site and designs for a statue of Thomas Jefferson, making report of the action of the commission—to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Oklawaha River, Florida—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Crisfield Harbor, Maryland—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed, with accompanying illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. McCARTHY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5351) to provide for the adjustment of certain sales of lands in the late reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians in the States of Kansas and Nebraska, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3936); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. CHANEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17915) granting an increase of pension to William W. Dudley, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3932); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17309) granting an increase of pension to John W. Chase, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3934); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. PRINCE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7226) for the relief of Patrick Conlin, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3935); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Under clause 2, Rule XIII, adverse reports were delivered to the Clerk, and laid on the table, as follows:

Mr. SLAYDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17195) for the relief of Richard Isaacs, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 3931); which said bill and report were ordered laid on the table.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following title were introduced and severally referred, as follows:

By Mr. JONES of Washington: A bill (H. R. 19108) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend d'Oreille River, in Stevens County, Wash., by the Pend d'Oreille Development Company—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 10, 1906.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. NELSON, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

TRADE CONDITIONS IN CUBA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting the report of Charles M. Pepper, special agent of the Department of Commerce and Labor, on trade conditions in the island of Cuba; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba, and ordered to be printed.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the findings by the court relative to the vessel brig Rebecca, John B. Thurston, master; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. C. R. MCKENNEY, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

S. 1975. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Dugger;

S. 2140. An act to authorize the Postmaster-General to dispose of useless papers in post-offices;

S. 5203. An act granting to the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul Railway Company, of Montana, a right of way through the Fort Keogh Military Reservation, in Montana, and for other purposes;

S. 5537. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to allot homesteads to the natives of Alaska;

S. 5572. An act to amend section 4348 of the Revised Statutes, establishing great coasting districts of the United States;

S. 5683. An act to provide for the removal of derelicts and other floating dangers to navigation;

S. 5890. An act to authorize the South and Western Railroad Company to construct bridges across the Clinch River and Halston River, in the States of Virginia and Tennessee;

S. 5891. An act to authorize the South and Western Railway Company to construct bridges across the Clinch River and the Halston River, in the States of Virginia and Tennessee; and

S. 5943. An act to authorize the Minnesota, Dakota and Pacific Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Missouri River.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the American Scenic and Historic Society, of New York City, N. Y., praying that an appropriation be made for the erection of a monument to Maj. John Wesley Powell, the explorer, and his companions, at some place near the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River, in Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a petition of the Council of Jewish Women of Chicago, Ill., praying that an appropriation be made for a scientific investigation into the industrial conditions of women in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of Local Union No. 106, Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators, and Paper Hangers of America, of Duluth, Minn., and a petition of sundry citizens of Milroy, Minn., praying for the enactment of legislation to remove the duty on denaturized alcohol; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KEAN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Lakewood, Sea Bright, Clinton, Ocean Grove, Camden, and Trenton, all in the State of New Jersey, praying for the adoption of a certain amendment to the postal laws relative to newspaper publications; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of Harry C. Runjin, of Plainfield, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigation; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented the memorial of Mrs. R. W. Smith, of Spring Lake, N. J., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to transfer from the Bureau of Education the education and care of the Indians and Eskimos of Alaska to the governor of that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented sundry petitions of citizens of Montclair, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to establish a children's bureau in the Department of the Interior; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BURNHAM presented petitions of Rev. George L. Mason and George A. Sanborn, of Rochester, and of the Granite State Automobile Club, of Manchester, in the State of New Hampshire, and of Jackson Demory, of Ithaca, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to remove the duty on denaturized alcohol; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Monday Club of Rochester, N. H., praying that an appropriation be made for a scientific investigation into the industrial conditions of women in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the petition of John Sebastian, passenger traffic manager of the Rock Island Railroad system, of Chicago, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate systems of farm management, and making appropriations therefor, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BURKETT presented sundry papers to accompany the bill (S. 5966) granting an increase of pension to C. C. Davis; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOPKINS. I present a protest against an amendment which was adopted yesterday on the rate bill, and I ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois asks for the reading of a dispatch which he sends to the desk. Without objection, the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

PEORIA, ILL., May 10, 1906.

Hon. A. J. HOPKINS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I protest against prohibiting passes to local railroad attorneys.

J. S. STEVENS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The dispatch will lie on the table.

Mr. DICK. I present a number of protests from organizations of railroad men against the same proposition referred to by the Senator from Illinois. I do not ask that they be read, but will ask the Senate to consent to their being printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The dispatches were ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO JUNCTION, OHIO, May 10.

Hon. CHARLES DICK, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.:

Over 70,000 railway employees and their families in Ohio request that you oppose the proposed amendment to rate bill pending in Senate which would prohibit railway companies issuing passes to such employees and their families.

W. T. FRANCIS,
Conductors' Legislative Representative for Ohio.

NEWARK DEPOT, OHIO, May 10, 1906.

Hon. C. F. DICK, Washington, D. C.:

Martin Lodge, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, 1,450 employees Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, request your aid in defeating bill now before the Senate depriving our families from free transportation on railroads. We request you to vigorously protest the passage of this bill.

J. L. MONTGOMERY, General Chairman.

CHICAGO JUNCTION, OHIO, May 9, 1906.

CHARLES F. DICK,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

As a grand officer, Order of Railway Conductors, representing 30,000 conductors, I request you use your influence to defeat any amendment prohibiting railroads issuing free transportation to their families.

W. H. BUDD.

NEWARK DEPOT, OHIO, May 9, 1906.

Hon. C. F. DICK,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Our division Brotherhood Locomotive Firemen, 2,450 employees Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, request you to use your influence in defeating the amendment to bill depriving our families from free transportation.

THOMAS F. ROBERTS,
General Chairman.

NEWARK DEPOT, OHIO, May 9, 1906.

Hon. CHARLES F. DICK,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

As general chairman Baltimore and Ohio Railroad system, division No. 33, the Order of Railroad Telegraphers, representing 1,500 employees of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad telegraphers' department, I earnestly solicit you oppose that part of the pending amendment to the freight regulation rate bill, wherein free transportation is denied railroad employees' families. If this amendment is passed as it now stands it simply means the curtailing of one of the very few luxuries that the railroad employees now enjoy.

E. N. VANATTA,
General Chairman.

CHICAGO JUNCTION, OHIO, May 9, 1906.

CHARLES F. DICK,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Order Railway Telegraphers protest through you against rate bill amendment forbidding passes employees' families be acted upon tomorrow.

A. R. MOORE, Chairman.

NEWARK DEPOT, OHIO, May 9, 1906.

Hon. C. F. DICK,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Licking Lodge, No. 80, International Association of Machinists, 1,350 employees Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, request your aid in defeating bill now before the Senate depriving our families from free transportation on railroads, and earnestly hope you will protest vigorously the passage of that bill.

J. E. FISHER,
District Representative.

NEWARK DEPOT, OHIO, May 9, 1906.

Hon. CHARLES F. DICK,
Washington, D. C.:

Licking division Order Railroad Conductors, 450 employees of Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, protest vigorously against the amendment to bill depriving our families from free transportation on railroads, and we appeal to you in hope you will use your best efforts to defeat same.

S. FULLER MOORE, Chairman.

ZANESVILLE, OHIO, May 9, 1906.

Hon. CHARLES F. DICK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Understand proposed amendment to rate bill forbids passes to members of employee's family and to counsel not exclusively employed by railroads. Such amendment would disarrange all our contracts with employees and counsel; would be a hardship on both, and serve no good purpose. Railroads should be allowed to issue passes to local counsel regularly appointed and acting, whether exclusively employed or not, and to dependent members of their families and those of employees. Most all railroads' counsel also take other business. Proposed amendment goes too far. Hope you will resist its adoption.

F. A. DURBAN.

PLYMOUTH, OHIO, May 9, 1906.

Hon. CHARLES F. DICK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Believing it would be gross injustice to employees if pending amendment to rate bill forbidding passes to employees' families becomes law, we earnestly request you to vote against the amendment.

O. A. FAUST,
Local Chairman Telegraphers.

NEWARK, OHIO, May 9, 1906.

Hon. C. F. DICK,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Division No. 36, Brotherhood Locomotive Engineers, 560 employees Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, earnestly appeal to you, our representative, to use your influence in defeating the amendment to bill depriving our families of free transportation on railroads.

CHAS. C. BOBO, Chairman.

Mr. PILES presented a petition of 114 citizens of Seattle, Wash., praying for an investigation into the existing conditions in the Kongo Free State; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of Pleasant Valley Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of St. Johns; of sundry citizens of Amboy, and of Everett Lodge, No. 281, Independent Order of Good Templars, of Everett, all in the State of Washington, praying for the removal of the internal-revenue tax on denaturized alcohol; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SCOTT. I have a number of petitions by wire on the same subject as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DICK] has presented, and I ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CULLOM. It seems to me that printing in the RECORD protests from lawyers simply is an unusual proceeding. I think we had better consent to print petitions from persons who are doing business besides lawyers, if we are to begin that course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois object to the request of the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CULLOM. I will not object in this case, but it seems to me it ought not to be done.

There being no objection, the dispatches were ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHEELING, May 10, 1906.

Senator N. B. SCOTT, United States Senate:

Please oppose provision in rate bill forbidding issue of passes to railroad attorneys.

ROBT. WHITE.
H. M. RUSSELL.

GRAFTON, W. VA., May 9, 1906.

Senator N. B. SCOTT, Washington, D. C.:

The telegraphers of West Virginia, whom I represent, earnestly protest against amendment to rate bill now pending, forbidding passes to employees' families, etc. We urgently request you to effect its defeat.

C. E. HOSLER, Chairman.

CLARKSBURG, W. VA., May 9, 1906.

Hon. N. B. SCOTT, Washington, D. C.:

Culberson amendment, forbidding passes except to counsel exclusively employed by railroads, will work much injury to railroads in this word "exclusively." Should be struck out. No one attorney can attend interest of roads in this State, and families of employees should not be excluded from benefit of passes. We think the amendment harsh and impractical. We trust you will oppose it.

JOHN BASSEL.
JOHN W. DAVIS.

HARPERS FERRY, W. VA., May 9, 1906.

Hon. Senator SCOTT, Washington, D. C.:

Kindly oppose amendment to rate bill relative restricting passes railroad employees and families.

C. E. MARLATT, Chairman Telegraphers.

CLARINGTON, W. VA., May 10, 1906.

Hon. NATHAN B. SCOTT, Washington, D. C.:

The Baltimore and Ohio telegraph operators protest against pending amendment to rate bill affecting free transportation for their families, and solicit your support to defeat this amendment.

M. C. RATHBUN, Chairman.

Mr. KEAN. I hope the Senators who have presented these numerous petitions will draw an amendment to satisfy their constituents and present it when the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. McLAURIN. I have a telegram, not from a lawyer, that I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, along with the other telegrams which have been ordered printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not object when the dispatch is from some one else as well as from lawyers, if that is to be the rule.

There being no objection, the dispatch was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

GREENVILLE, MISS., May 9, 1906.

Senators H. D. MONEY and A. J. MCLAURIN,
Washington, D. C.:

Use herculean efforts to defeat Senate amendment prohibiting issuance of free transportation to families of employees and secure everlasting gratitude of a million railway employees.

J. H. ALDERSON,
Agent, Southern Railway.

Mr. BULKELEY presented a petition of 12 citizens of Bridgeport, Conn., and a petition of the Norwalk Business Men's Association and Board of Trade of Norwalk, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to remove the duty on denaturized alcohol; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Municipal Art Society of Hartford, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to prevent the impending destruction of Niagara Falls on the American side by the diversion of the waters for manufacturing purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PENROSE presented petitions of 20 citizens of Klingerstown; of Major Jennings Council, No. 367, Junior Order United American Mechainc, of Shenandoah, and of Fairview Council, No. 89, Daughters of Liberty, of Philadelphia, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of the Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Mount Washington, Pa., and a petition of 47 citizens of Allegheny, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the closing of the Jamestown Exposition on Sunday; which were referred to the Select Committee on Industrial Expositions.

He also presented petitions of 15 citizens of Gettysburg; of Local Grange No. 58, of Wysox; of Local Union No. 380, of Lancaster; of the Backus Water Motor Company, of Philadelphia; of D. B. Maurice Grange, No. 111, of Athens; of Local Grange No. 1155, of Summit, and of Local Grange No. 507, Patrons of Husbandry, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the removal of the internal-revenue tax on denaturized alcohol; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of the congregation of the Presbyterian Church of Ellwood City; of the congregation of the Huntingdon Valley Presbyterian Church, of Huntingdon Valley; of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of Abington; of the congregation of the Presbyterian Church of Freeport; of the congregation of the East Whiteland Presbyterian Church, of Frazer; of the Home and Foreign Missionary Society of the congregation of the Presbyterian Church of Dunbar; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Allegheny County; of the congregation of the Second Presbyterian Church of Wyalusing; of the congregation of the Second Presbyterian Church of Butler, and of the Young Woman's Christian Association of Wilkes-Barre, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ELKINS. I present a number of telegrams from railroad telegraphers, engineers, and members of the Brotherhood of Trainmen, protesting against the passage of the amendment to the rate bill as to passes. I will ask that one be read and that the others lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia asks for the reading of a dispatch. Without objection, the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

GRAFTON, W. VA., May 10, 1906.

Hon. S. B. ELKINS,
Washington, D. C.:

The Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen of West Virginia, whom I represent, earnestly protest against amendment to rate bill now pending affecting free transportation, and urgently request that you use your influence to effect its defeat, as we feel it affects our personal privileges.

W. A. MITCHELL, Chairman.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The dispatches sent to the desk by the Senator from West Virginia will lie on the table.

Mr. ELKINS presented a petition of Liberty Council, No. 137, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Bedington, W. Va., praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. BEVERIDGE presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Indianapolis, Ind., praying for the passage of the so-called "Philippine tariff bill;" which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Indianapolis, Ind., praying for the ratification of the Santo Domingo treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Indianapolis, Ind., praying for the ratification of international reciprocity treaties; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of the congregation of the First Presbyterian Church of Hammond, of the congregation of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Vincennes, and of the Woman's Missionary Society of the Second Presbyterian Church of Madison, all in the State of Indiana, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Goshen, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to remove the duty on denaturized alcohol; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Ladies' Social Circle of the First Baptist Church of Indianapolis, Ind., praying that an appropriation be made for a scientific investigation into the industrial conditions of women in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a couple of dispatches protesting against the passage of the pass provision in the railroad rate bill. I will not ask that they be printed in the RECORD. I do not think that is necessary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The dispatches presented by the Senator from Illinois will lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 18439) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Tallahatchie River, in Tallahatchie County, Miss., reported it without amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17982) to grant to Charles H. Cornell, his assigns and successors, the right to abut a dam across the Niobrara River on the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, Nebr., and to construct and operate a trolley or electric railway line and telegraph and telephone line across said reservation, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. ALGER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1413) for the relief of Thomas J. Spencer, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BULKELEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1584) to correct the military record of Alexander Everhart, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

CONDEMNATION FOR RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15095) authorizing the condemnation of lands or easements needed in connection with works of river and harbor improvement at the expense of persons, companies, or corporations, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just read?

Mr. BACON. I could not catch the reading here. I should like to look at it for a moment.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say to the Senator from Georgia that it is a House bill which has passed the House, and it is recommended by the War Department, and unanimously reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BACON. I do not wish to delay the bill if it is meritorious. I confess, however, that it appears to me to be a bill which must have been introduced for the purpose of meeting some particular case, as it is quite unusual in its terms. It says:

> That whenever any person, company, or corporation, municipal or private, shall undertake to secure, for the purpose of conveying the same to the United States free of cost, any land or easement therein, needed in connection with a work of river and harbor improvement duly authorized by Congress, etc.

We have a law now by which whatever is needed by the Government may be condemned.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it is a case where the citizens of a town agreed to give the Government the site for the river and harbor improvement, but they struck some men with whom they can not deal. The object is to authorize the Government to institute condemnation proceedings in these cases, to be paid by the parties who are to furnish the site.

Mr. BACON. I do not object to the object at all, but it is an unusual proceeding. This is really a proceeding to condemn what is for private use by the individual.

Mr. NELSON. No; it is for the benefit of the Government.

Mr. BACON. Oh, I understand that. I, of course, understand that the ultimate purpose is that the Government may have the use of it; but, if I understand the reading of the bill, it will be condemned in order that a private person may hereafter convey it to the Government. That is altogether an anomalous proceeding, so far as I have information as to any precedent or anything in harmony with the general rule of law.

Of course we recognize the fact that there can be condemnation proceedings for the benefit of the Government, but here is a case where it is provided that where a private individual desires to convey property and can not himself secure a good title to the Government he can condemn it for the purpose of putting title in the individual, in order that he may convey to the Government. I do not think that is in contemplation of law, and that is what I understand to be the purpose of the bill.

The purpose, I have no doubt, is entirely meritorious, and I do not desire to defeat the purpose; but it occurs to me that the method by which the purpose is sought to be effectuated is not one in harmony with the requirements of the general law which authorizes a condemnation proceeding for the benefit of the Government. This is for the purpose of condemning property that the title may go into an individual who will thereafter convey it to the Government. The purpose can be effected, if it has to be condemned, by the individual paying the Government the amount of money which the Government would have to pay to condemn it. In that way he would indirectly be conveying the property.

Mr. FRYE. The bill requires him to give good and sufficient bond.

If the Senator will allow me one moment, I will state that the case is liable to arise in this way: For instance, there was a project to connect the lake at Tacoma with the Sound. The United States made an appropriation for that purpose, providing that the State of Washington or the city of Tacoma would furnish a free right of way from the lake to the shore. My recollection is that they failed, because they could not secure the free right which they wanted to the shore in every case; and there were a number of cases where they were not able to secure it.

This bill simply provides for meeting a case like that, where the Government is appropriatiing money for the improvement of rivers and harbors and there is a failure on the part of the State or the city to secure the right of way free to the Government. It is hardly ever an individual; I have never known an individual to have anything to do with it. The bill simply provides that the Government may institute condemnatory proceedings through the Attorney-General, that to secure the right a sufficient bond shall be provided, that the land shall be conveyed after condemnation, and that all the cost and expense shall be paid by the party. It seems to me that there could not be anything safer than that.

Mr. BACON. The Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BACON. If the Chair will pardon me a moment, I will answer definitely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Maine does not meet the point of my objection. It is not that the Government may be put to expense or that the party may not carry out the agreement after the condemnation, but the point is that the bill authorizes a condemnation not for the Government, although the Government will have the ultimate benefit of it, but for an individual who is thereafter to convey to the Government. It is not a question of expense or of uncertainty as to what the party will do, but as to our right to pass a law which shall condemn property for the benefit of an individual and put the title in the name of the individual, even though he is under bond thereafter to convey to the Government.

I do not wish to delay the bill in any unreasonable manner, but I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota if he will let it go over until to-morrow, so that we can have an opportuntiy to examine it, it may be that it is all right. If it does go over I will ask that it go over without losing its place. It occurs to me now that there is very grave difficulty in the bill from a legal standpoint.

Mr. FRYE. I admit I do not see it myself. Both the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House and the Committee on Commerce of the Senate have found something to be absolutely necessary under circumstances which arise like that which I have suggested.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Senator that in a case such as he has instanced it is entirely competent for condemnation proceedings to be had in the name of the Government and for the Government, and then that the parties who wish to make the donation can return to the Government the amount of money which shall be awarded to the party in interest and against whom the condemnation proceedings are had. It is a very different thing and one, so far as I can now see, utterly unauthorized by the law to authorize the condemnation of property for a private individual, even though that private individual does give bond thereafter to convey to the Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not see anything in the bill, when one reads it carefully, that attempts to authorize an individual to condemn any real estate. It provides:

That whenever any person, company, or corporation, municipal or private, shall undertake to secure, for the purpose of conveying the same to the United States free of cost, any land or easement therein, needed in connection with a work of river and harbor improvement duly authorized by Congress, and shall be unable for any reason to obtain a valid title thereto—

Which means by purchase, of course. It could not mean anything else. Then it confers the jurisdiction on the Secretary of War—

the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, cause proceedings to be instituted in the name of the United States.

Mr. BACON. But if the Senator will read the bill further he will find that the contemplation is that the title shall go to the party who desires to make the donation, because there is a provision in it that he shall give bond that he will convey to the Government after the condemnation proceedings.

Mr. President, I will ask that the bill go over until to-morrow. I will not interpose any objection after I have had time to examine it, if I see that it is all right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BACON subsequently said: Mr. President, since House bill 15095 was before the Senate, I have had an opportunity to read it, and I find that I misunderstood the Senator from Maine in saying, as I understood him to say, that there was a bond required of the party to convey to the Government after the condemnation proceedings. I find that that is a mistake, and that the condemnation is really to be not in favor of the individual, but of the Government. I therefore withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been read. Is there objection to its present consideration?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEEL LIGHT VESSEL AT ENTRANCE TO JUAN DE FUCA STRAIT.

Mr. PILES. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6003) to construct and place a steel light-ship on "Forty Fathom Bank," so-called, off the entrance to the Straits of Juan de Fuca, to report it with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in line 5, after the word "upon," to strike out the remainder of the bill and insert:

Swiftsure Bank, off the entrance to Juan de Fuca Strait, at a point at or near 13 miles north 74 degrees west, magnetic, from Cape Flattery, a steel steam light vessel, equipped with the latest improved light and fog signals, at a cost not to exceed $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to construct and place a steel light vessel on Swiftsure Bank, off the entrance to Juan de Fuca Strait."

ROANOKE RIVER BRIDGE, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BERRY. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 18204) to authorize the Northampton and Halifax Bridge Company to construct a bridge across Roanoke River at or near Weldon, N. C., to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Arkansas.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JURORS IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. FORAKER. I am directed by the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5512) defining the qualifications of jurors in Porto Rico, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just read?

Mr. HALE. Will not the Secretary read again that portion of it relating to the exemptions from jury duty?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That the exemptions from jury duty allowed by the local law shall be respected by the court when insisted upon by veniremen.

Mr. FORAKER. I will state for the benefit of the Senator from Maine that the only purpose of the bill is to change the law so that they can select men who understand the English language for jurors in the United States courts.

Mr. HALE. Is that the only infirmity in the present law in relation to the choosing of veniremen?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; it is practically the only one. It is the only one I know of. The bill is recommended by the judge of the United States district court for Porto Rico, by the United States district attorney for Porto Rico, and by the Attorney-General.

Mr. HALE. What are the qualifications of jurors?

Mr. FORAKER. The organic act of Porto Rico provides that the district court of Porto Rico shall have, in addition to the jurisdiction which belongs to United States district courts generally, the jurisdiction of the circuit court, and it makes applicable to Porto Rico, in so far as not locally inapplicable, the laws of the United States, among which is the statute requiring the selection of jurors to conform to the local laws, and conforming to the local laws the requirements for jurors in the local court do not exactly suit the requirements of the business in the United States district court, where it is by law required to be conducted in the English language.

Mr. HALE. That is all there is in the bill?

Mr. FORAKER. That is all there is in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just read?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FORAKER, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill defining the qualifications of jurors for service in the United States district court of Porto Rico."

LAKE MICHIGAN IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 134) authorizing the construction and maintenance of wharves, piers, and other structures in Lake Michigan, adjoining certain lands in Lake County, Ind., to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, it was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DICK introduced a bill (S. 6097) to regulate the keeping of employment agencies in the District of Columbia where fees are charged for procuring employment or situations; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AID BY CUBAN GOVERNMENT TO SAN FRANCISCO SUFFERERS.

Mr. CULLOM. I present some correspondence, a letter from the Secretary of State and a letter to him from the Cuban Government. I ask that they both be read, so that they may go into the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 9, 1906.

Hon. SHELBY M. CULLOM,
Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate.

SIR: In connection with the President's message of the 3d instant, referred to your committee, I have the honor to inclose for your information a copy of a dispatch from the American minister at Habana, received on the 7th instant, reporting that the House of Representatives of Cuba unanimously passed a bill appropriating $50,000 for the San Francisco sufferers.

This information would have been communicated in the President's message of the 3d instant if it had been received in time.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ELIHU ROOT.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Habana, Cuba, May 2, 1906.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

SIR: On April 30 the lower house of the Cuban Congress suspended the regular course of business and approved unanimously a bill to appropriate the sum of $50,000 from the public treasury for the relief of the San Francisco sufferers. This bill upon its introduction to the upper house was referred to the finance committee.

In view of the desire of President Roosevelt, as reported in the public press, that the American people might be accorded the privilege of attempting to alleviate the condition of their distressed fellow-citizens without extraneous aid and that assistance from abroad must therefore be declined, I availed myself of a suitable occasion to intimate to the Secretary of State that the proposal for a special grant would indicate as clearly as would the passage of the bill authorizing the appropriation Cuba's sympathy, and that it might be desirable in view of this fact for the Cuban Congress without further legislation to content itself with this expression of its benevolent intention.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

EDWIN V. MORGAN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communications will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CULLOM submitted an amendment providing for the application of a sum not to exceed $1,000,000 from the indemnity fund received as reimbursement from the Chinese Government, for the purchase of ground and the erection of buildings for consular offices in China, Korea, and Japan, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment providing for the acquisition of land for a public park lying east of Thirtieth street and Branch avenue and north and south of Pennsylvania avenue extended in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for the purchase, installation, and maintenance of water meters in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—MARY CORNELIA HAYS ROSS.

On motion of Mr. MCCUMBER, it was Ordered, That the papers filed in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, in connection with the bill S. 3935, Fifty-eighth Congress, granting an increase of pension to Mary Cornelia Hays Ross, be withdrawn, no adverse action having been taken on the same.

AFFAIRS OF M'KINLEY MANUAL TRAINING SCHOOL.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia, by subcommittee or otherwise, is hereby directed to investigate, at its discretion, all matters connected with the administration of the affairs of the McKinley Manual Training School, to inquire into the conduct of the scholars and the discipline of said school, and also to make such further investigation of school affairs in the District of Columbia as said committee shall deem advisable.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there are no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 12987.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unless there are further amendments to section 1 of the bill, the Secretary will read section 2.

The Secretary proceeded to read section 2, beginning on page 3 of the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to section 2, which is——

Mr. LODGE. I suggest that the Senator's amendment will be in order after the section shall have been read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. After the reading of the section is concluded by the Secretary, the Chair will recognize the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] for the purpose of offering his amendment.

The Secretary read section 2 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 6 of said act, as amended March 2, 1889, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall print and keep open to public inspection schedules showing the rates, fares, and charges for the transportation of passengers and property which any such common carrier has established, and which are in force at the time upon its route. The schedules printed as aforesaid by any such common carrier shall plainly state the places between which property and passengers will be carried, and shall contain the classification of freight in force, and shall also state separately the terminal charges, icing charges, and all other charges which the Commission may require, and any rules or regulations which in any wise change, affect, or determine any part of the aggregate of such aforesaid rates, fares, and charges. Such schedules shall be plainly printed in large type, and copies for the use of the public shall be posted in two public and conspicuous places in every depot, station, or office of such carrier where passengers or freight, respectively, are received for transportation, in such form that they shall be accessible to the public and can be conveniently inspected.

"Any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act receiving freight in the United States to be carried through a foreign country to any place in the United States shall also in like manner print and keep open to public inspection, at every depot or office where such freight is received for shipment, schedules showing the through rates established and charged by such common carrier to all points in the United States beyond the foreign country to which it accepts freight for shipment; and any freight shipped from the United States through a foreign country into the United States the through rate on which shall not have been made public, as required by this act, shall, before it is admitted into the United States from said foreign country, be subject to customs duties as if said freight were of foreign production.

"No change shall be made in the rates, fares, and charges or joint rates, fares, and charges which have been established and published by any common carrier in compliance with the requirements of this section, except after thirty days' public notice, which shall plainly state the changes proposed to be made in the schedule then in force and the time when the changed rates, fares, or charges will go into effect; and the proposed changes shall be shown by printing new schedules, or shall be plainly indicated upon the schedules in force at the time and kept open to public inspection: Provided, That the Commission may, in its discretion and for good cause shown, allow changes upon less than the notice herein specified, or modify the requirements of this section in respect to publishing, posting, and filing of tariffs, either in particular instances or by a general order applicable to special or peculiar circumstances or conditions.

"And when any such common carrier shall have established and published its rates, fares, and charges in compliance with the provisions of this section, it shall be unlawful for such common carrier to charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for the transportation of passengers or property, or for any services in connection therewith, than is specified in such published schedule of rates, fares, and charges as may at the time be in force.

"Every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall file with the Commission hereinafter provided for copies of its schedules of rates, fares, and charges which have been established and published in compliance with the requirements of this section, and shall promptly notify said Commission of all changes made in the same. Every such common carrier shall also file with said Commission copies of all contracts, agreements, or arrangements with other common carriers in relation to any traffic affected by the provisions of this act to which it may be a party. And in cases where passengers and freight pass over continuous lines or routes operated by more than one common carrier, and the several common carriers operating such lines or routes establish joint tariffs of rates, fares, or charges for such continuous lines or routes, copies of such joint tariffs shall also in like manner be filed with said Commission. Such joint rates, fares, and charges on such continuous lines so filed as aforesaid shall be made public by such common carriers when directed by said Commission, in so far as may, in the judgment of the Commission, be deemed practicable; and said Commission shall from time to time prescribe the measure of publicity which shall be given to such rates, fares, and charges, or to such part of them as it may deem it practicable for such common carriers to publish, and the places in which they shall be published.

"No change shall be made in joint rates, fares, and charges, shown upon joint tariffs, except after thirty days' notice to the Commission, which shall plainly state the changes proposed to be made in the schedule then in force and the time when the changed rates, fares, or charges will go into effect. The Commission may make public or require the carriers to make public such proposed changes in such manner as may, in its judgment, be deemed practicable and may prescribe from time to time the measure of publicity which common carriers shall give to advances or reductions in joint tariffs.

"It shall be unlawful for any common carrier party to any joint tariff to charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for the transportation of persons or property, or for any services in connection therewith, between any points as to which a joint rate, fare, or charge is named thereon, than is specified in the schedule filed with the Commission in force at the time.

"The Commission may determine and prescribe the form in which the schedules required by this section to be kept open to public inspection shall be prepared and arranged and may change the form from time to time as shall be found expedient.

"If any such common carrier shall neglect or refuse to file or publish its schedules or tariffs of rates, fares, and charges as provided in this section or any part of the same such common carrier shall, in addition to other penalties herein prescribed, be subject to a writ of mandamus, to be issued by any circuit court of the United States in the judicial district wherein the principal operating office of said common carrier is situated or wherein such offense may be committed, and if such common carrier be a foreign corporation in the judicial circuit wherein such common carrier accepts traffic and has an agent to perform such service, to compel compliance with the aforesaid provisions of this section; and such writ shall issue in the name of the people of the United States, at the relation of the Commission appointed under the provisions of this act; and the failure to comply with its requirements shall be punishable as and for a contempt; and the said Commission, as complainant, may also apply, in any such circuit court of the United States, for a writ of injunction against such common carrier to restrain such common carrier from receiving or transporting property among the several States and Territories of the United States, or between the United States and adjacent foreign countries, or between ports of transshipment and of entry and the several States and Territories of the United States as mentioned in the first section of this act, until such common carrier shall have complied with the aforesaid provisions of this section of this act."

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have sundry verbal amendments to offer to this section, which have been recommended by the Interstate Commerce Commission; which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 24, after the word "shall," it is proposed to insert "file with the Commission created by this act and;" and on page 3, line 25, after the word "showing," to insert the word "all;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That section 6 of said act, as amended March 2, 1889, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall file with the Commission created by this act and print and keep open to public inspection schedules showing all the rates, fares, and charges for the transportation of passengers, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 1, it is proposed to strike out the word "the," before the word "transportation;" and in lines 1, 2, and 3 to strike out the words "of passengers and property which any such common carrier has established and which are in force at the time upon its route," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "between different points on its own route and between points on its own route and points on the route of any other carrier by railroad or by water when a through route and joint rate have been established."

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I am afraid that the insertion of the words "or by water" may give this provision a different significance from what it now has. I do not see any occasion for using the words "or by water" in that connection.

Mr. TILLMAN. Here is a memorandum sent me by the Interstate Commerce Commission, in which they explain why that is done. I will have the memorandum read for the information of the Senate, if it is so desired.

Mr. ALDRICH. I shall be glad to have it read. Those words might make an important difference under certain conditions.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

The sixth section of the present law, and as it is proposed to be substantially reenacted with a few amendments in the Hepburn bill, is framed upon no consistent or reasonable theory or plan. In its present form it results from adding onto the original section, passed in 1887, the amendments of 1889. As the section now stands, with the amendments proposed in the Hepburn bill, individual and joint rates are without any reason treated differently. As to the individual rate, there must be thirty days' public notice of change and prompt notice, whatever that may mean, of such change to the Commission. As to the joint rate, there must be thirty days' notice to the Commission, and such publicity given to the proposed change as the Commission may order. Again, as to the individual rate, the Commission has authority to vary the time of notice of any change in that rate, but as to the joint rate, the Commission can not vary the time of notice to itself of a proposed change in that rate.

There is no reason why the joint rate as to publication at stations and notice to the Commission should not stand upon the same footing as the individual rate. So far as the public is concerned, a rate is a rate, whether it is over only one railroad or applies over two or more railroads; and as to either rate the necessity for publication is the same. If the proviso in the Hepburn bill authorizing the Commission to allow changes in the individual rate upon less than the thirty days' notice specified or to modify the requirements in relation to publishing and posting the tariffs is valuable to the public or a necessity to the carriers, it should be made to apply also to joint rates; but as above indicated, as the bill now stands the Commission has no authority to vary the requirement for thirty days' notice to the Commission of changes in joint rates. Moreover, the law should distinctly provide for the publication of joint rates, just as it does for the publication of individual rates.

A large portion of the act to regulate commerce and most of the Elkins law was framed to secure adherence to published tariffs. It follows that the provisions of the law respecting the filing and publication of such tariffs should be definite and certain as to joint rates as well as individual rates. There should also be in section 6 a distinct prohibition forbidding a carrier to receive or participate in the transportation affected by the act unless the rates, fares, and charges upon which the same is transported have been filed and published in accordance with the provisions of this section, and that the published rates shall be invariably observed.

To accomplish this purpose the Commission, in what is known as the "Commission bill," redrafted section 6 of the act to regulate commerce. Section 2 of the Hepburn bill, which aims to amend section 6 of the act to regulate commerce, should be amended as shown on the inclosed copy of the Hepburn bill.

With this will also be found a formal amendment setting forth the changes so indicated.

The first purpose of the amendment is to provide in one paragraph as well for the filing with the Commission as for the publication of all rates, whether individual or joint, and to include therein all terminal charges, storage charges, and all special privileges or facilities granted or allowed. This places the filing and publication of all schedules on the same footing and makes such schedules include all rates, privileges, or facilities.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is all that relates to this special amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is no allusion here to the reasons for inserting the words "or by water," when the transportation may be under different conditions entirely from the conditions named in the first section of the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. I presume that it has reference or is intended to include water transportation along with railroad transportation, or partly by railroad and partly by water, as defined at the bottom of the first page of the act.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. KEAN. Noticing the memorandum which has just been read from the Interstate Commerce Commission, I yesterday introduced an amendment which covers the sixth section of the act in regard to interstate commerce. The amendment that I introduced is one prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and is the same as was in the Interstate Commerce Commission's bill which they presented some time since.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mention has just been made of that in the memorandum.

Mr. KEAN. With one change. I introduced that amendment yesterday, as the Senator will see, and I now offer it to this section.

Mr. TILLMAN. What is the change the Senator makes?

Mr. KEAN. The only change is in line 2, on page 2 of the amendment, where the words "icing charges" are inserted.

Mr. TILLMAN. It will save time and be perfectly agreeable to me to let the Commission's substitute which it sent in its original bill be acted upon, instead of going through the troublesome process of inserting these amendments to the Hepburn bill.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think it is due to the committee to make a brief statement as to this section 6. The pending bill was framed to make as few changes as possible in the existing interstate-commerce law. In the bill sent to the committee by the Interstate Commerce Commission, section 6 was rewritten and everybody agreed that many valuable improvements were made in it, especially in its literary phraseology and in the clearness with which its provisions were expressed. However, it was the wish of the committee to intrude as little as possible upon the language of the interstate-commerce law in view of the fact that that law had stood for twenty years and had been reasonably effective so far as the publication of the rates was concerned. Therefore the two important suggestions of the Commission, first, in relation to the separate publication of icing charges, and, second, in relation to the discretion of the Commission to set aside the requirements of the law in special cases as to publication—with those two amendments, the original interstate-commerce law expressed with practical fullness everything that the Commission appeared to desire. For that reason the committee dropped from the bill the new section 6 which the Commission had prepared, and confined itself to this slight amendment of the existing section 6.

I do not deny that the Commission's rewriting of the bill is more modern and more in consonance with present railway conditions, and I have no objection at all, with the amendment which the Senator from New Jersey has suggested—of a separate requirement for icing charges—that the section as originally framed of the interstate-commerce bill should be substituted for section 2 in the pending bill. I think it would cover all the points made by the amendments which the Senator from South Carolina has offered.

Mr. TILLMAN. To save time and a considerable amount of routine which we will have to devote to something else I am perfectly willing to accept the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], that the substitute which he has offered shall go into the bill instead of my amendment of the Hepburn bill in this piecemeal way.

Mr. KEAN. Then I will offer the substitute.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from South Carolina withdraws his proposed amendment, and the Senator from New Jersey proposes a substitute for the amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. The proposed substitute strikes out all after line 22, on page 3.

Mr. LODGE. I think the amendment should be worded so as to show that it comes in after the word "follows," in line 22, because it is not section 6 of the pending bill, but section 2. It is section 6 of the old act that is proposed to be amended.

Mr. KEAN. The amendment is to come in on page 3, line 22, after the following words:

SEC. 2. That section 6 of said act, as amended March 2, 1889, be amended so as to read as follows.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3 it is proposed to strike out all after the word "follows," in line 22, down to the end of the section, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 6. Every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall file with the Commission created by this act tariffs showing all the rates, fares, and charges for transportation, as defined in the first section of this act, between points upon its own route and between points upon its own route and points upon the route of any other carrier when a through route and joint rate have been established by agreement or otherwise; and this provision shall apply when the route connecting two points in the United States passes through an adjacent foreign country and when the traffic is moving to or from any foreign country. Such tariffs shall plainly state the places between which passengers or property will be carried, shall contain the classification of freight in force, and shall also state separately all terminal charges, including storage, icing charges, and all privileges or facilities which shall be allowed other than those involved in the transportation of passengers or property, as defined in the first section of this act, in ordinary course between two definite points, and any rules or regulations which in any wise change, affect, or determine any part or the aggregate of said rates, fares, and charges, or the value thereof, to the shipper or consignee. Every such common carrier shall also file with said Commission copies of all contracts, agreements, or arrangements relating to any traffic or transportation affected by the provisions of this act to which it may be a party.

The carrier shall plainly print such tariffs in large type, and shall keep posted, for the use of the public, two copies in two public and conspicuous places in every depot, station, or office of such carrier where passengers or freight, respectively, are received for transportation, in such manner that they shall be accessible to the public and can be conveniently inspected.

No change shall be made in any tariff of rates, fares, and charges filed and published as aforesaid unless the carrier shall file with the Commission a statement showing such changes and the date when they shall take effect, and shall post new tariffs, as hereinbefore provided, or plainly indicate such changes upon those already posted, at least sixty days before the taking effect of such changes; but the Commission may, for good cause shown, allow changes upon less than sixty days' notice, and may do this either in a particular instance or by general order applicable to special conditions and species of traffic.

The names of the several carriers which are parties to any joint tariff shall be specified therein, and each of the parties thereto, other than the one filing the same, shall file with the Commission such evidence of concurrence therein or acceptance thereof as may be required or approved by the Commission; and where such evidence of concurrence or acceptance is filed it shall not be necessary for the carriers filing the same to also file copies of the tariffs in which they are named as parties.

The Commission may determine and prescribe the form, subjects to be contained in, and arrangement of the tariffs required to be published and filed, as aforesaid, and may change such form, subjects, or arrangement thereof from time to time as shall be found expedient.

The Commission may, in its discretion and for good cause shown, change or modify the foregoing requirements in respect of the publishing, posting, and filing of tariffs, and may do this either in particular instances or by general order applicable to special or peculiar circumstances or conditions.

No carrier shall, unless otherwise provided by this act, receive or participate in the transportation of passengers or property, as defined in the first section of this act, unless the rates, fares, and charges upon which the same are transported by said carrier have been filed and published in accordance with the provisions of this section; nor shall any carrier charge or demand or collect or receive a greater or less or different compensation for such transportation of passengers or property, or for any service in connection therewith, between the points named in such tariffs than the rates, fares, and charges which are specified in the tariff filed and in effect at the time; nor shall any carrier refund or remit in any manner or by any device any portion of the rates, fares, and charges so specified, nor extend to any shipper or person any privileges or facilities in the transportation of passengers or property, except such as are specified in such tariffs.

Any freight shipped from the United States through a foreign country into the United States, the through rate on which shall not have been made public as required by this act, shall, before it is admitted into the United States from said foreign country, be subject to customs duties as if said freight were of foreign production, and any law in conflict with this section is hereby repealed.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, by the courtesy of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], I desire to make a brief statement about a matter not concerning the amendment immediately pending.

A day or two ago an amendment which I presented prohibiting the issuance of passes was adopted by the Senate. The amendment accomplished the purposes which I had in view, but in drafting it hastily at my desk due consideration was not given to the exceptions which were made. I desire, therefore, to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted, merely entering it, not asking to have it acted on now, however; and I will state that if that motion shall prevail I will ask to have what I send to the desk substituted in lieu of the amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. Let it be reported.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Texas that this matter be taken up in the Senate when it is reached.

Mr. CULBERSON. I prefer to take this course, if the Senator please.

Mr. ALDRICH. Of course, if the amendment comes back in the Senate for one purpose, it comes for all purposes, and it may give rise to long discussion as to what disposition shall be made of it. I think it is much better to let it be acted upon there.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not ask that the motion to reconsider be acted upon now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas merely enters the motion.

Mr. CULBERSON. I merely enter the motion to reconsider.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask the Senator from Texas to state what the amendment is he proposes to change?

Mr. CULBERSON. I have already stated it; but I will state it again.

Mr. SPOONER. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

That no carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall hereafter directly or indirectly issue or give any interstate free ticket, free pass, or free transportation, except to the officers, agents, and employees, and members of their immediate families, actual and bona fide attorneys, of the carrier issuing the same, to ministers of religion and inmates of hospitals and eleemosynary and charitable institutions and indigent persons. Any carrier violating this provision shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall for each offense pay to the United States a penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $2,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider is entered; and the proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. FORAKER. I only want to say before we pass from this matter that I hope the Senator from Texas will insist upon his motion to reconsider in Committee of the Whole, so that the matter may be determined before we report the bill to the Senate.

Mr. KEAN. Now, Mr. President, let us have a vote on my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that it it extremely difficult for those of us who have not had the opportunity for critical examination to learn whether the substitute for section 6 is complete in all particulars that are of importance. As I understand, the amendment proposes to strike out entirely section 6 and substitute this in place of it. If that is true, I wish to ask the Senator from New Jersey whether the provision of the present bill found on page 8, beginning in line 4 and running through to page 9, concluding in line 5, is substantially incorporated in the proposed amendment?

Mr. KEAN. All I can say to the Senator from Georgia is this: The amendment was prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it was done after very careful examination, and was put into the bill which the Commission sent to the Committee on Interstate Commerce on the 28th day of last November. They very strongly advocate the amendment. I think everything is included in it except that part of the bill to which the Senator has called attention.

Mr. BACON. That seems to me to be a very important part of this bill. It is the method by which the previous requirements of the section can be enforced. I have not had time to read carefully the Senator's amendment to see whether that is supplied in some other way.

Mr. KEAN. I think it is supplied in other parts of the bill.

Mr. BACON. It is not in other parts of the present bill, unless I am mistaken about it.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from New Jersey will permit me, I will say to the Senator from Georgia that the amendments which I proposed to insert in the Hepburn bill were prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission, but that previously they had prepared a bill of their own, which they submitted to the Interstate Commerce Committee, but which was not adopted by anybody. In their memorandum, which was read at the desk a little while ago, they state that the present law is a kind of a composite arrangement that is more or less involved and contradictory, and in some places obscure, and that in rewriting it they had prepared a bill of their own which made it more symmetrical and clear. I accepted the substitute of the Senator from New Jersey upon the faith I have in the Commission, that they know more about it than either he or I or the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I am very free to accord what the Senator says about myself. I do not profess to know very much about it, and have made no such professions in the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not attempting to criticise the Senator. I can not answer his question. I do not think any man in the Senate can. We are taking it on the confidence we have in the Interstate Commerce Commission, that they understand this question, and they have suggested these amendments.

Mr. BACON. I, of course, accord to the Commission very great ability in this line, and the utmost good faith, but at the same time the responsibility is on us and not on the Commission, and I think it would be a very serious proposition that we should not only as to small isolated provisions of this bill accept their judgment, but that we should proceed to strike out four or five pages of this bill and insert something else in place of it, simply upon the ground that any persons outside of the Chamber are in favor of it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BACON. I will, but there is so much conversation around that it is very difficult to understand what the Senator says.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that this amendment be adopted in Committee of the Whole, and then the Senator can investigate it, and he can easily make any suggested changes in the Senate if it is found not to be correct.

Mr. BACON. I do not know about that; that is not our usual method of procedure. Of course I am not in charge of the bill; I am not one of the very active agents in its consideration and discussion. I am endeavoring to gather what I can from the discussion of others, and am trying to contribute what I can to make it an effective bill. I find this, which is a very serious proposition to me, although I may be mistaken about it. On page 8, which is a part of the section proposed to be stricken out by the amendment, there are a series of provisions by which the requirements of this section are to be enforced and made effective and compulsory. Now, I ask the Senator from New Jersey this question——

Mr. KEAN. I think if you will look on page 24 of the House bill——

Mr. BACON. Page 24?

Mr. KEAN. Wait a minute.

Mr. LODGE. It is entirely covered.

Mr. KEAN. Page 8, line 24.

On page 8, lines 4 to 9 are stricken out, because the provision for mandamus is wholly covered on page 24, lines 14 to 22, inclusive.

Mr. LODGE. That covers the whole thing.

Mr. BACON. There is something more here than the mere matter of mandamus. If the Senators who have suggested this and who have looked into it are prepared to say that the provisions found on pages 8 and 9, by which alone, so far as I can see——

Mr. KEAN. I will say to the Senator that the penalties for a violation of this clause are found also in the amendment already enacted, known as the "Elkins law," and this does not repeal the Elkins law.

Mr. BACON. If that is the case, this was originally an improper provision to incorporate in the bill.

Mr. HALE. Unnecessary.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from New Jersey says it is already the law. I do not see how that can be. I do not see how the provisions of the Elkins law can properly enforce the provisions of this bill.

I do think that Senators who father it—those who advocate it—ought to be in a position at least to give us definite and positive and unambiguous explanations and opinions in regard to it, and not simply refer to somebody else. It is evident from the answers of the Senator himself and those who are endeavoring to assist in reply to that question that nobody has given careful examination—at least, nobody who has yet spoken—to this proposed amendment to see whether or not it does carefully preserve the essential features of the part of the bill which it is proposed to strike out.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, a good many weeks ago I had the duty of examining, with some care, the changes suggested by the Interstate Commerce Commission in section 6, and I think I can say to the Senator from Georgia that the changes are mainly administrative in character and such as have been suggested by the practical experience of the Commission.

Now, as to the omission in the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey of any reference to——

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question respecting this matter. Is the proposed amendment of the Senator from New Jersey an amendment that was prepared by the Commission prior to the reporting of this bill to the Senate by the Senate committee?

Mr. DOLLIVER. In reply to the Senator from Illinois, I will say that at the beginning of the session the committee, by resolution, requested the Interstate Commerce Commission to send us a bill containing what in their opinion would cover the points which we desired to amend in the existing interstate-commerce law, and this section, which the Senator from New Jersey has offered was section 2 of that Interstate Commerce Commission bill. Now, it had a good many departures in language and some departures in substance from the existing law.

So far as I am personally concerned, I did not regard the departures from existing law as of sufficient importance to warrant the committee in abandoning four or five pages of the existing interstate-commerce law, though I did not doubt, and do not now doubt, that the phraseology of the section, as prepared by the Commission, is in many respects an improvement upon section 6 of the existing interstate-commerce act.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to know of the Senator from Iowa if at the time this bill was reported he favored the section as reported in the bill over the proposed amendment of the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. DOLLIVER. At that time I went through a great many anxieties in my devotion to the existing bill, and yet I did it solely because I was impressed with the notion that the fewer changes that were made in a law that had been in existence for twenty years the better on the whole it would be.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like the Iowa Senator to state what has come over his spirit to cause him this morning to advise the Senate to abandon the section that was reported by the committee and to adopt a section that was prepared by the Commission?

Mr. DOLLIVER. In reply I will say that the Commission has sent here a half dozen or more amendments. I endeavored at the time to secure the insertion in the bill of some of those which the Commission regarded as important. But the language was difficult to readjust to the new provisions, and the Commission have taken the view that on the whole the new draft of the entire section which they have agreed upon after very laborious consideration is superior to the old law, and since the matter concerns entirely the administration of the law I am not disposed to hold a controversy with the Commission as to the language. Now, the old proviso——

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa what change, if he is able to state it, the amendment makes in the text of the bill which it is intended to supplant?

Mr. DOLLIVER. That would be a very difficult matter to state, as the changes are very numerous.

Mr. SPOONER. I am speaking of essential changes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The essential change in the old law, which is provided in the pending bill, is in the proviso which gives to the Commission a discretion to suspend and set aside the provisions of the law in respect to the publication of rates——

Mr. ALDRICH. And the notice.

Mr. KEAN. And the notice.

Mr. DOLLIVER. And the notice in connection therewith.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to ask the Senator whether the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey was carefully considered by the committee and rejected for the section which the committee reported to the Senate?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am bound to say that the committee did not bend very much intellectual energy to that subject at the time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am bound to say I did not hear the Senator's answer.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Owing to the peculiar situation of the committee, these details did not receive very profound consideration.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course these details involve just five pages of the bill.

Mr. KEAN. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that they are very carefully drawn.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The substance——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If I may be permitted, the Senator from New Jersey injected the remark that they were very carefully drawn. I ask the Senator from New Jersey, Which was carefully drawn? The provision which the committee reported, or the provision which he now offers as an amendment?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Both.

Mr. KEAN. The one I offer.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Which was the more carefully drawn?

Mr. KEAN. I can not answer for the bill before the Senate, because I had no part in its preparation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the one you now offer was the more carefully drawn, why did not the committee report it?

Mr. DOLLIVER. This is not a controversy between the committee and the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is a controversy between the law of 1887 and those amendments, which have been suggested by the Commission in order to make the law more workable.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, we have been discussing this bill, more or less, for the last three months. It has been understood pretty generally, whether on authoritative information or not I do not know, that the Commission was largely responsible for this bill. Whether that is true or not I do not know. I want to enter a general protest against this method of doing business. On yesterday there came in a material amendment, and I will venture to say nobody on the floor is able to state what it means. We know it changes the original bill, or else there is no necessity for the amendment. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], who offered it and whose name it bears, I understand does not attempt to explain it. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], who had this bill largely in his keeping, does not know what it is.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. This section has been on the statute books for twenty years, and there is no more reason why I should know what it contains than there is that the Senator from Colorado should understand it.

Mr. TELLER. I am not talking about section 6. I am talking about this new amendment. I know what is in section 6.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Then the Senator is the man to point out to the honorable Senator from Georgia what the difference is between that and the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. But the Senator was not able to tell the Senator from Georgia what the difference was. Now, before I vote for any measure I want to know what it means.

Mr. SPOONER. What changes it makes in the law.

Mr. TELLER. I want to know what changes it makes in the law, if that is the law we are proposing to reenact. The Senator who has the bill in charge, I think, admits that he does not know what the changes are.

Mr. TILLMAN. I sent to the desk a memorandum which explains exactly what is to be done, and the changes, and the reasons for them. The Senator from Colorado did not listen, or he would know. I can send it to the desk and have it read again.

Mr. TELLER. I do not depend on a proposition read from the desk.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will allow the communication to be read again.

Mr. TELLER. I am willing that it shall be read, but my method in dealing with these subjects is to take the bill and read it myself. I confess my inability to get a proper idea of a bill read from the desk and the desk alone. I do not believe any other Senator can, either.

Mr. President, after three months, when we had supposed that the sixth section which was in the bill was what was proposed, here comes a change. I do not know whether it is a material change or not. I do not know whether it is better than the original bill. I am not one of those who believe it to be my duty here as a Senator to take the word of somebody outside for it. If you are going to let the Commission make this bill, send it to the Commission and let them make it, and then adopt it. Mr. President, it is a vicious and unheard-of system of doing business. Here it came yesterday for the first time. Nobody has been able to see it or to know what it was until this morning. Then it is taken up. I understand it is to be railroaded through and put in the bill, and we will find out later some time whether it makes any change.

I suppose it is in the power of the Senate to vote this amendment in now. But I do not believe it is in the power of the Senator who has the bill in charge to accept it and prevent me from having an opportunity to vote against it if I see fit. I do not know whether I want to vote against it.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from South Carolina has not attempted anything of the kind.

Mr. TELLER. I know he has not. I do not know that I have any objection to it. I am not in the habit, and I do not intend to be driven into it, either, of accepting a material change in a bill because somebody outside, who is not charged with the responsibility I am, concludes that it is better than that which we had before us for fully three months. It may be better, but decent legislation requires that we should have time to understand it and look into it. The Senator says he has had something read here. He can have it read again if he wants, but I shall not be able myself to form an opinion upon this subject until I can take the two propositions—what is in the bill now and this amendment—and compare them. I am not willing, I repeat, to submit to the Commission the making of this bill. The people of this country do not expect us to submit to the Commission the making of this bill. We are expected to make it here, with the assistance of the other body. If we are going to abandon our province of legislation here, either because it will be easier or pleasanter or because we are afraid we can not do it ourselves, let us be honest about it and send it to the Commission and wait until the Commission shall determine what we ought to do.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from South Carolina started to perfect this section, which obviously needs a great many amendments, by offering a series of amendments. Then one amendment was offered, a well-drawn substitute, which would have saved the Senate the trouble of going through all those amendments, and the Senator from South Carolina, in conduct of the bill, very wisely said he would be glad to substitute a single draft, making all the changes and perfecting it, instead of taking the time of the Senate in going through it line by line and making a series of small but necessary changes in the wording. It seems to me that that course is in the interest of the expedition of business.

The amendment offered is a well-drawn section in place of one less well drawn and to which it is proposed by the committee to offer a series of amendments. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], all members of the committee, assure us that it is simply substituting a well-prepared and carefully drawn draft for one that confessedly still needs a great deal of amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator says it is a well-drawn section, I presume from having read it or having familiarized himself with it, and, therefore, the Senator is the proper Senator to whom I may address the interrogatory to advise the Senate what essential changes it makes in the existing law.

Mr. LODGE. I was going on, if the Senator will allow me, to explain my position. I was going to say that when three Senators on the committee—and, as far as I know, all the members of the committee who have given it attention—assure the Senate that it is an advisable thing to do to take this section drafted by the Interstate Commerce Commission as a proper substitute instead of perfecting it laboriously here by amendments line by line, which would take the whole day, I am sufficiently poor spirited to be ready to accept the say-so of the committee; and I think when they assure us of that we can trust the committee to that extent.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. I observe that the proposed section 6, which the amendment says is to be inserted in lieu of section 6 of the bill, relates to subjects other than those embraced in section 6 of the bill. I observe also that there are subjects covered by section 6 of the bill that are omitted in the section 6 which is offered instead thereof. In other words, section 6 readopts section 16a and inserts after section 16 of the interstate-commerce act section 16a, and section 16a provides for an application for a rehearing and rules therefor. The new section offered leaves out all of that, and we do not know, without an explanation at least, where we would be if we adopt this section in lieu of the one which comprehends another matter.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it all appears plain in the memorandum read at the desk. It appears that the clauses referred to that were left out are covered by later insertions.

Mr. DANIEL. There are no later insertions here.

Mr. LODGE. And by other clauses in the bill. I do not profess to be expert about the bill, but it seems to me that if we can not take the statement of the committee on details of this kind we shall occupy a good deal of unnecessary time in the completion of the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Virginia confuses section 6 of this act with section 6 of the interstate-commerce act, which is proposed to be amended by the second section of this act.

Mr. DANIEL. There is no explanation of that in the amendment. I see nothing to indicate that.

Mr. KEAN. The amendment, I will say to the Senator, is offered to section 2 of the bill, which is to amend section 6 of the interstate-commerce act.

Mr. BEVERIDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. DANIEL. But the offering of this amendment in the proposition named would seem to refer to section 6 of the pending bill.

Mr. KEAN. It is section 6 of the interstate-commerce act.

Mr. LODGE. Not section 6 of this bill, but section 6 of the interstate-commerce act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is at the foot of page 3 of the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. I apprehend what is done here, but there is no statement in the amendment as proposed where it is to come in in this bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I did not know that I had been taken from the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Massachusetts to have yielded.

Mr. LODGE. I yielded to the Senator from Virginia. Then the debate became general and I sat down.

Mr. DANIEL. My only purpose was to find out from the reading of the paper where it would apply.

Mr. LODGE. I will say as preliminary that I do not pretend to be in the least familiar with the details of this section. It refers to section 2 of the bill before us and to section 6 of the interstate-commerce law, not to section 6 of the pending bill. I think that will aid us in understanding it as a preliminary.

So far as I can make out from listening to the memorandum read at the desk and the discussion which has occurred and from reading and comparing the amendments, it seems to me simply to be a redraft in better form of what is before us here in section 2, and that the omitted portions, so far as I have been able to trace them, are covered by later insertions. That is only what I have learned from the committee and from the debate this morning.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, it appears to me that the method of this proposed amendment is seriously important to the Senate. For three months the Senate has been considering this bill and its amendments. For a long time before that the House considered the bill, and the House then sent it to this body. For months the Interstate Commerce Committee held hearings and deliberated upon this measure. And now, after this lapse of time, upon the eve of the passage of what some have termed the most important measure that has been passed since the civil war, a method of amendment is proposed which consists of merely offering, without explaining the differences, an amendment five pages long to take the place of five pages of the bill.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has addressed every Senator who has advocated this amendment and asked each Senator to point out the changes, and although two of those Senators are members of the committee they have not been able in detail to do so.

It thus appears, Mr. President, that as a method of safety in legislation we had better consume the few additional moments or even the few additional hours that are suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts as being necessary before we adopt an amendment about which the Senate knows nothing. It might be satisfactory to the Senator from Massachusetts, it might be satisfactory to two or three other Senators, and it might, if we understood it, be satisfactory to the entire Senate; but it must be patent to every one that if this method of amendment is adopted any evil and any vice might creep into a law for which every one of us would be responsible before the country, and for the putting in of which we could give no excuse except that we took the word of some person else.

It occurs to me that if the bill was worth pending three months in discussion and many more months in investigating before it was reported, now when it is upon the eve of its passage it is worth taking a few moments to find what is contained in an amendment which involves five pages of the bill.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I was only going to suggest that in the memorandum which has been read at the request of the Senator from South Carolina it seems to me all the changes are explained. I may be wrong, however.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who is one of the most observant and closely interested Senators in this body in all matters of practical legislation, said he did not understand from the casual reading the explanation made in that memorandum.

Mr. LODGE. He can send to the desk for it and read it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Senators sitting around me have the same experience. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that that memorandum assumes to explain merely the detailed amendments which were to be offered by the Senator from South Carolina. It was not read as an explanation of the five pages of amendments which were offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that what we are now confronting is a method of proposed amendment which, after months of debate upon a bill which everybody declares to be exceedingly important, proposes to take out of the bill the committee has reported and that the Senate has been discussing five pages and introduce five other pages. If the mere statement of that proposition does not show the recklessness of such a method, I can not imagine any language that could exhibit the recklessness more plainly.

It may be that the proposed amendment is precisely the thing the Senate wants to adopt. The important thing is that the Senate does not know whether it is the thing it wants to adopt. It is the method, Mr. President, to which I raise objection, and which, it occurs to me, is more important perhaps than the amendment itself. If that method of procedure be allowed in the Senate, then why not introduce a substitute for the entire bill, which might be satisfactory to two or three members of the committee?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I am a member of the committee that had this bill under consideration and from which there was finally a report made. In view of all that has been said about the responsibility of the committee in that connection, I think it is due to the committee to say that we received from the Interstate Commerce Commission a bill which we understood they had prepared with very great care. It was then taken under consideration, and after it had been considered for a few days, before we had reached any final conclusion with respect to it, when we were in good faith debating its respective provisions, we learned from the newspapers and otherwise that that bill, by the friends of the proposed rate legislation, had been abandoned, and that another bill had been substituted; and in a printed form it was brought before us for our consideration. Later that bill was introduced in the Senate by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]. We never had any opportunity in the committee to compare the two bills and take action with respect to them which would show our preference for the one over the other.

The truth is that the whole matter is properly characterized in this memorandum from the Interstate Commerce Commission—and it is the language I wanted the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to have read a few minutes ago, so that every Senator here might have the benefit of it—when they say:

> The sixth section of the present law, and as it is proposed to be substantially reenacted with a few amendments in the Hepburn bill, is framed upon no consistent or reasonable theory or plan.

That is exactly true. That is the kind of a bill we have, relating to the most important subject we have had under consideration, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] a few minutes ago well said, since the civil war. That is the kind of a bill that has been prepared and brought in here, and with respect to which in that committee we could not consider and act upon any amendment whatever. Every amendment was cut off from consideration by the action that was taken by a majority of the committee. All these matters would have been carefully gone over and would have been carefully considered and acted upon.

When the bill was thus brought in, when consideration of the bill was thus denied, when opportunity to act upon it was thus prevented, I do not wonder that now as we come to consider it in the Senate we have this kind of difficulty. It is a serious difficulty. I am not satisfied with the sixth section, either as it is in the bill before the Senate or as it is in the bill as it was originally prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission; but I am of the opinion, in view of the comments the Interstate Commerce Commissioners have made, that their section as they originally prepared it and sent it to us is a better section than the one in the bill before the Senate. For that reason I am disposed to favor the amendment that has been offered by the Senator from New Jersey as a substitute as he has proposed.

But, Mr. President, except you take up this printed memorandum and read it through from beginning to end, you will have very great difficulty to tell just what the distinctions are. As the Commission point out, one of the most serious difficulties is that this section, which was framed without regard to any reasonable theory or plan—I believe is the language of the Commission—is what we had no opportunity to change. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] has suggested to me that it was framed twenty years ago. That is true, but the Senator adopted it in his bill, and we were given no opportunity to point out its defects or to take any action upon it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if he will kindly state what change this proposed amendment makes in the law?

Mr. FORAKER. I was about to point out that it is impossible, without taking this memorandum in hand and going through it in a detailed way, to point out what all the changes are. But the first one is that the section as embodied in the bill that is under consideration in the Senate deals differently with individual rates from what it does with joint rates. That is one of the objections the Commission urge against the present bill and in favor of the substitution of the amendment that is offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN].

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is the only important change?

Mr. FORAKER. That is a very important change. They point out quite a number of others. I will take the time to read it if that is desired.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio a question.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator if he does not think it would be wise to have section 6 reprinted with these amendments inserted in italics, and that it be passed over for the present in order that we may compare the proposed amendments with the original text more carefully and understand them?

Mr. FORAKER. When it was suggested a few days ago that we should pass over some proposed amendment, it was ruled, I believe, by the Chair, that under the unanimous-consent agreement under which we are acting no amendment could be passed in that way, but that we must discuss and dispose of each amendment as presented.

Mr. ALDRICH. The amendment could be withdrawn.

Mr. KEAN. I do not care anything specially about this amendment. I want to perfect the bill. If there is any objection to it, I have no hesitancy whatever in withdrawing it, so that we may go on with the bill. I want to get through with the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that all these amendments could be withdrawn and that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey could then be printed in parallel columns with the section as it stands in the bill. Then we could go on with the reading of the third section of the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I think it would be better to recommit the whole bill and then have some intelligent consideration of it in committee, for never since I have been a member of this body has a committee been deprived of the right to consider and act upon a bill until now, and I hope it will be a long time before any other committee is ever deprived of that right, because sooner or later, in the Senate or somewhere, you must answer for that sort of proceeding.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I desire to ask on what page of the pending bill is this amendment to commence?

Mr. TILLMAN. On page 3.

Mr. FORAKER. At the bottom of page 3.

Mr. PETTUS. Section 6 of the bill is on page 18.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the trouble is that the Senator is confusing the two 6's. We are on section 2 of the bill, incorporating in it a new section 6 of the interstate-commerce law.

Mr. PETTUS. I understand that, but the amendment does not state which one of the 6's it is to be a substitute for.

Mr. FORAKER. Let me say to the Senator from Alabama that is a very trifling thing to make serious mention of in connection with this bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, before I proceed and try to get something done, I want to comment just briefly upon the implied criticism and more or less, I will not say vituperation of the committee, but it was bordering on it, of the Senator from Ohio. There was such difference of opinion in that committee and such obstructive tactics, as it seemed to me, to do nothing, emanating from those with whom the Senator from Ohio seemed to be in affiliation, that I almost felt that it was a waste of time to go there, because whenever the committee met the demand would be, "Let us read the bill." It would take an hour to read the bill of from 50 to 70 pages, and by the time we got through reading it would be nearly 12 o'clock, and then we would take up something and immediately the Senator would go to make the speech which he afterwards made in the Senate [laughter]; and with one method of doing nothing and another we simply never did do anything.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Did the Senator discover any more diversity of opinion in committee than he has discovered in the Senate?

Mr. TILLMAN. Not half as much, for we were only thirteen there and we have about eighty-five here.

Mr. FORAKER. Will not the Senator admit that he was aware we could agree at any time in the committee if he and all the others who agreed with him had agreed with those of us who were acting with myself, as he has stated? [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Undoubtedly, if the majority of the committee had agreed to let the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Rhode Island have their way, as they seem now about to have it, we could have brought in a bill that was entirely satisfactory to all I do not know how much longer ago than we did.

Mr. FORAKER. And if we had agreed with the Senator from South Carolina we could have reported a bill at any time. In other words, Mr. President, what I want to ask the Senator to admit, as I am sure he will, is that our differences were bona fide differences there just as they are here.

Mr. TILLMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FORAKER. And I think every member of the committee, the Senator from South Carolina included, as emphatically as everybody else, was struggling to consider the bill fairly and to make a good bill that we might report to the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Undoubtedly; but we never did consider any of it. We read it and then immediately we began to talk, and that was the end of it.

Mr. FORAKER. Now, one other question——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. FORAKER. Does not the Senator from South Carolina think it would have been well if we had read the bill even oftener than we did?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island rises to a question of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. It seems to me this discussion is out of order. It is simply a discussion about what transpired in committee several months ago. It has nothing to do with this question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not feel willing to let all the blame appear to rest on the majority that had brought the bill out of committee.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I withdraw the substitute; and I hope we will now go on with the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey withdraws his proposed amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope Senators will get the amendments now and let us do something. On page 3, line 24, after the word "shall," I move to insert the words "file with the Commission created by this act and."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That has been agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then, in line 25, at the bottom of page 3, after the word "showing," I move to insert the word "all."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That has been agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then, on the top of page 4, in the first line, I move to strike out the word "the."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That has been agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then, on page 4, lines 1, 2, and 3, I move to strike out the words—of passengers and property which any such common carrier has established and which are in force at the time upon its route.

And to insert—

between different points on its own route and between points on its own route and points on the route of any other carrier, by railroad or by water, when a through route and joint rate have been established.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I object to the words "or by water," because they are put into this section where they ought not to be and in a manner which will raise great doubt about what is their meaning. I suggest that the Senator accept the language which was contained in the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Jersey, which reads as follows:

Between points upon its own route and between points upon its own route and points upon the route of any other carrier when a through route and joint rate have been established by agreement or otherwise.

That accomplishes the same purpose and leave out the words "or by water," which may have a very doubtful meaning in this connection. If the Senator is willing to accept that language I will——

Mr. TILLMAN. I can not accept anything. The Senate must accept it. If we turn only to page 1 and read in section 1, commencing in line 8, we come on that very phraseology:

Or partly by railroad and partly by water when both are used under a common control, management, or arrangement for a continuous carriage or shipment.

It seems to me that the language "or by water" would apply to a through route which would be a combination of railroads and steamboats.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not sure whether it would or not. Therefore I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina by substituting the language I have just read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina insert:

Between points upon its own route and between points upon its own route and points upon the the routes of any other carrier when a through route and joint rate have been established by agreement or otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, that amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island ought not to be adopted. The object of that part of the bill is to provide that the carrier shall furnish a schedule of its through rates. A part of that through route may be water as well as land, by steamboat as well as rail, and it ought to be included in the bill. There is no reason at all why it should be excluded.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator from Minnesota is entirely mistaken. The language which I propose to insert is the language of the bill which the Interstate Commerce Commission itself prepared and offered as a substitute for the pending bill. A through route is a through route by rail or water, and it makes no difference whether the language is used or not. My objection is that the words "or by water" would in this connection give an entirely different force and effect to the provision than it would have if the words were left out. I am not sure but that it might apply to all water rates on the Lakes or on the Atlantic seacoast.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, it is intended to cover the case where a route is partly by rail and partly by water.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is a through route within the provisions of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. In that case it ought to be included.

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly. The Senator and I do not disagree about that. The only objection I make is that it may include something much more.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no; it can not include anything else.

Mr. ALDRICH. If it will meet the objection of the Senator, I suggest that after the words "or by water" we insert "as provided in section 1 of this act."

Mr. NELSON. The word "water" can do no harm there, and it certainly makes the bill clear and specific.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest we put in after the word "water" the words, "as provided in the first section of this act."

Mr. NELSON. What is the object in putting in those words?

Mr. ALDRICH. So that the through routes provided for here shall be the same through routes that are defined in the first section of the act and no others, making the two correspond.

Mr. NELSON. There is no need of that correspondence.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think there is. I think there is very great danger——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question. I could not hear distinctly what he said in his colloquy with the Senator from Minnesota. I desire to ask the Senator whether he contends that the bill does not contemplate the regulation of interstate commerce, so far as a part of the shipment may be by water?

Mr. ALDRICH. Where they are under one control and management.

Mr. BACON. But the bill goes further than on page 1.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think not.

Mr. BACON. It says "wholly by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water, when both are used under a common control, management, or arrangement, for a continuous carriage or shipment."

Mr. ALDRICH. I think, in the section under consideration, we ought not to go beyond the definition given in section 1.

Mr. BACON. I want to ask the Senator this question: Suppose a shipment from Chicago to New York, by rail from Chicago to Albany, N. Y., and by boat from Albany to New York, which can be, of course, prescribed by the shipper; does the Senator contend that that shipment in its entirety, and the rate under which that shipment was made, would not be under the regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission under this bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. It would not unless——

Mr. BACON. If it is not, it ought to be.

Mr. ALDRICH. It would not unless "both are used under a common control, management, or arrangement for a continuous carriage or shipment." Otherwise it would not be.

Mr. BACON. If it is not under such regulation, then this bill ought to be corrected. If it is true that the bill as now framed would not reach a case of that kind, then there ought to be an amendment which would make it reach it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then the structure of the bill would have to be changed.

Mr. BACON. I think not.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly, it would have to be.

Mr. BACON. I do not think so, Mr. President. I think that interstate commerce is not limited to railroads by any means, but that by every possible reason it should include any through shipment which extends from State to State, any continuous shipment where a part of it is by water, as well as where the whole of it is by rail. By what possible reasoning could the Senator from Rhode Island contend that whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission should have the right to regulate the rate of shipment in case of complaint between Chicago and New York where it was all by rail they should not have the right to regulate it in case of complaint where part of it was by rail from Chicago to Albany and the remainder, from Albany to New York, by water? Upon what reason would the Senator base the contention that that should not be subject to interstate-commerce regulation?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Congress probably has the same power over interstate commerce by water that it has over interstate commerce by land, but there never has been any attempt on the part of Congress to control, and this bill does not contemplate any control, over interstate commerce by water except upon the conditions named in the first section of the bill—that is:

Where—

I read the language again—

any common carrier or carriers engaged in the transportation of passengers or property wholly by railroad (or partly by railroad and partly by water when both are used under a common control, management, or arrangement for a continuous carriage or shipment), etc.

If it is the purpose of the Congress or of the Senate to extend over interstate commerce by water the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission other than as here mentioned, that involves an absolute revolution in this proposed act and would import into it purposes and results which no man has yet contemplated in connection with this legislation.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Rhode Island allow me to put a question to him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to the Chesapeake and Ohio case, which has recently been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. ALDRICH. Very well.

Mr. NELSON. In that case the coal was shipped from West Virginia down to tidewater, thence by water up to New Haven by way of Long Island Sound, and from thence by rail farther up in New England. There was a shipment at both ends by rail and in the middle by water. Does the Senator insist that we ought not to control such a shipment?

Mr. ALDRICH. We ought to have controlled it, and we did control it, because the lines were under one common management and control, and it was a continuous shipment. Those shipments undoubtedly came within the provisions of the interstate-commerce act, but there never has been any attempt made, so far as I know, under the provisions of the act, to control shipments by water other than under such conditions. Does the Senator think that a shipment from Duluth, or from one lake port to another, ought to the put under the provisions of this act?

Mr. NELSON. Not if it is a shipment from one lake port to another. That is different. Here is the language:

Between different points on its own route and between points on its own route and points on the route of any other carrier by railroad or by water when a through route and joint rate have been established.

That is the language. It is not where the entire route is by water, but it is where the route is partly by rail and partly by water. Why should not the public——

Mr. ALDRICH. But suppose——

Mr. NELSON. Let me finish. If the shipment is partly by rail and partly by water, why should not the public at large know what that whole rate is from one point to another, even though part of it is by water? Why should they be limited to having a rate published only where the route is partly by rail and not have the rate for the entire distance?

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think the language of the first section ought to be enlarged or that these conditions ought to be removed, so that independent shipments by water ought to be included in the through routes and put under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. NELSON. That is not the point—where it is wholly a shipment by water—but where it is a shipment partly by water and partly by rail, where the goods are billed through. Why, in such a case, should not the schedule of rates be published and fixed as to the entire route and not as to only a part of it?

Mr. ALDRICH. But suppose the part by water is by an entirely independent line, and not under one common control and management and not by continuous carriage or shipment?

Mr. NELSON. If the goods are received and billed through as one continuous shipment, I think they should be under the provisions of the bill. Let me give the Senator from Rhode Island an illustration. In the State of Minnesota the steel trust has large iron mines. They have railroads built from those mines down to the coast on Lake Superior. They charge such rates for shipping ore that the independent lines can not compete with them, and when the State of Minnesota undertakes to regulate the rates they come into court and say that they have shipped their ore billed through from their mines to Cleveland and other ports on the lake; that it is, therefore, interstate commerce and the State can not regulate it. Where the carrier comes in and claims immunity from State regulations on the ground that it is interstate traffic, why should not a shipment of that kind be put under Federal regulation and the carrier be required to publish its rates? If the steel trust ships a carload of iron or a lot of iron ore from the Messaba or from the Vermilion mines in Minnesota, and bills it through to Cleveland as one entire shipment, why should not the public be advised as to the entire rate from the mines to Cleveland?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think I shall have to resume the floor, as the question of the Senator from Minnesota is getting to be too extensive.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

Mr. KNOX. It seems to me there is likely some confusion here about a very simple proposition. This bill does not propose to make any change in the existing law as to the character of the carrier to which the provisions of the law apply.

I think the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is entirely correct in his interpretation of the act as it stands, and that contains the same language that is used in the pending bill. In my humble judgment, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] is mistaken when he regards the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] as susceptible of being construed so as to expand the application of the act.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. KNOX. Will the Senator permit me to finish the sentence so as to make my thought entirely clear?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. The proposition of the Senator from South Carolina is simply applied to the posting of the rates; and whatever transportation between the States is covered by the act, such transportation includes transportation by rail and water when it is used as a continuous carriage, whether under common management or ownership or not.

The mere fact that this amendment proposes that the public should have the benefit of notice of these rates does not expand or enlarge the class of carriers to which the act is intended to apply, and does apply, in my opinion.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was not certain about that myself, and I am glad to have the assurance of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. I was only anxious to know that no such construction would be possible as might be inferred from the use of the words "or by water" in a different connection from the way they are used in the first section of the bill; and I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. KNOX. It could not possibly apply to water unless water was a part of the continuous carriage and it was under one common management.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. I send the remainder of the amendments which I desire to offer to this section to the desk, and ask that they may be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] will be stated in their order.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 7, strike out the word "the" and insert the word "all;" and on page 4, line 7, after the words "terminal charges," insert the words "storage charges."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 9, after the word "require," insert "all special privileges or facilities granted or allowed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 10, strike out the word "of," first occurring in said line, and insert the word "or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 11, after the word "charges," insert the following: "or the value of the service rendered to the passenger, shipper, or consignee."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 13, after the word "be," insert the word "kept."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 17, after the word "inspected," insert the following:

The provisions of this section shall apply to all traffic, transportation, and facilities defined in section 1 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 9, strike out the word "established" and insert the word "filed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 11, strike out the words "public notice" and insert "notice to the Commission and to the public published as aforesaid."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, strike out lines 23, 24, and 25, and on page 6, lines 1 to 6, inclusive, and insert the following:

The names of the several carriers which are parties to any joint tariff shall be specified therein, and each of the parties thereto, other than the one filing the same, shall file with the Commission such evidence of concurrence therein or acceptance thereof as may be required or approved by the Commission, and where such evidence of concurrence or acceptance is filed it shall not be necessary for the carriers filing the same to also file copies of the tariffs in which they are named as parties.'

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, strike out lines 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, and the words "Commission of all changes made in the same" in line 12.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] what is the purpose of striking out, on page 6, from lines 7 to 12, inclusive, the following language:

Every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall file with the Commission hereinafter provided for copies of its schedules of rates, fares, and charges which have been established and published in compliance with the requirements of this section, and shall promptly notify said Commission of all changes made in the same.

Mr. TILLMAN. The purpose is to require the publication of both through and local rates. There are provisions in the law as it is now which separate the two classes of tariffs or of schedules, and the purpose of all these amendments is to compel the publication of through rates and local rates in the same schedule at the depots.

Mr. CULBERSON. Then this requirement will be provided for otherwise in the bill?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I present now, simply that it may be printed, an amendment which I shall offer to the first section of the bill when we return to it, in order to make free from any ambiguity the provision of the law with reference to water carriage in interstate commerce. I will ask that it be read in order that Senators may have it brought to their attention in the RECORD and can make the insertion themselves in the copies of the bill they have before them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 1, line 8, after the word "railroad," it is proposed to insert "or wholly by water;" and also, in section 1, page 1, line 11, to insert the words "by through bills of lading or otherwise."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

The Secretary will state the next amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 6, line 12, it is proposed to strike out the word "such," at the end of the line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 6, line 13, after the word "carrier," it is proposed to insert the words "subject to this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 6, line 16, after the word "party," it is proposed to strike out all of the bill down to and including line 23, on page 7.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BACON. What is that amendment?

Mr. NELSON. I should like to hear that amendment read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 6, line 16, after the word "party," it is proposed to strike out all of the bill down to and including line 23 on page 7.

Mr. BACON. Is that an amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will explain here that the Interstate Commerce Commission says:

A large portion of the act to regulate commerce and most of the Elkins law was framed to secure adherence to published tariffs. It follows that the provisions of the law respecting the filing and publication of such tariffs should be definite and certain as to joint rates as well as individual rates. There should also be in section 6 a distinct prohibition forbidding a carrier to receive or participate in the transportation affected by the act unless the rates, fares, and charges upon which the same is transported have been filed and published in accordance with the provisions of this section, and that the published rates shall be invariably observed.

This is where the new law and the existing law are in conflict and where there is confusion, and the purpose of the amendment is to try to clarify it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the Senator from South Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 8, beginning with line 4, it is proposed to strike out to the end of the section, in line 5, page 9.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we agreed to one amendment there, on page 7, lines 7 to 23.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That was included in the other amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 8, beginning in line 4, it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the section and to insert the following:

No carrier shall, unless otherwise provided by this act, engage or participate in the transportation of passengers or property, as defined in the first section of this act, unless the rates, fares, and charges upon which the same are transported by said carrier have been filed and published in accordance with the provisions of this section; nor shall any carrier charge or demand or collect or receive a greater or less or different compensation for such transportation of passengers or property, or for any service in connection therewith, between the points named in such tariffs than the rates, fares, and charges which are specified in the tariff filed and in effect at the time; nor shall any carrier refund or remit in any manner or by any device any portion of the rates, fares, and charges so specified, nor extend to any shipper or person any privileges or facilities in the transportation of passengers or property, except such as are specified in such tariffs.

Mr. BACON. Do I understand that is proposed in lieu of the provision found on page 8 of the bill?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; in lieu of the part stricken out.

Mr. BACON. From line 4, page 8, to line 5, page 9.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; this is a substitution for that.

Mr. BACON. I want to say a word about that. The Senator may be correct. Of course I am open to conviction about it and will gladly conform to his amendment if I am shown to be incorrect; but I do not think, Mr. President, that the provision which is proposed to be inserted in lieu of that which is stricken out relates directly to the matter which is incorporated in the provision which is thus proposed to be stricken out. I will read the words proposed to be stricken out, and I will ask the attention of the Senate to them. After providing for the filing of rates and their publication, etc., beginning in line 4, page 8, is the following language:

If any such common carrier shall neglect or refuse to file or publish its schedules or tariffs of rates, fares, and charges as provided in this section or any part of the same, such common carrier shall, in addition to other penalties herein prescribed, be subject to a writ of mandamus, to be issued by any circuit court of the United States in the judicial district wherein the principal operating office of said common carrier is situated or wherein such offense may be committed, and if such common carrier be a foreign corporation in the judicial circuit wherein such common carrier accepts traffic and has an agent to perform such service, to compel compliance with the aforesaid provisions of this section; and such writ shall issue in the name of the people of the United States, at the relation of the Commission appointed under the provisions of this act; and the failure to comply with its requirements shall be punishable as and for a contempt; and the said Commission, as complainant, may also apply, in any such circuit court of the United States, for a writ of injunction against such common carrier to restrain such common carrier from receiving or transporting property among the several States and Territories of the United States, or between the United States and adjacent foreign countries, or between ports of transshipment and of entry and the several States and Territories of the United States as mentioned in the first section of this act, until such common carrier shall have complied with the aforesaid provisions of this section of this act.

It will be noted, Mr. President, that that section contains the provisions by which the machinery is provided for the enforcement of the provisions with reference to the publication of schedules. The important fact to which I want to call the attention of the Senate is this, that, while that language is found in the pending bill, it is copied almost word for word from the law as it now stands; and the effect of the adoption of the amendment just proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, if I correctly understand it, will be not simply to change the provisions of the pending bill, but to very materially change the provisions of the existing law.

We have before us a compilation, if I may so term it, which embraces the pending bill and also the existing law as it will be if the pending bill should be passed; in other words, the existing law with the amendments which will be incorporated upon it by the pending bill. By referring to page 36 of that compilation, beginning in the twenty-first line to the end of the twenty-second line on page 37, it will be found that the pending bill is almost identical with the provision in the present law, the only difference being such as indicated by the words stricken out and the words inserted in italics. There are only five changes made in the existing law by the pending provision which it is proposed to strike out. These five changes are as follows—and I state them to show that they are not material changes: On page 37, line 2, after the word "principal" and before the word "office," the word "operating" is inserted, so that it will read, instead of "principal office," as in the present law, "principal operating office;" in line 9 the word "Commissioners" is stricken out and the word "Commission" is inserted; in line 12 again the word "Commissioners" is stricken out and the word "Commission" inserted; and in line 13 the word "complainants" is stricken out and the word "complainant" is inserted. So that, for all practical purposes, the provision of the pending bill which is found on pages 8 and 9, which it is proposed to strike out, may be said to be verbatim the existing law, the amendments which are proposed to it being altogether formal and not material.

So that we have the proposition here, Mr. President, not simply to strike out of the pending bill this provision, but we have the proposition to strike out of the existing law the provisions which have been incorporated, and have been there for twenty years, by which it is sought to enforce the requirements for the publication and filing of these schedules.

What reason is given for such a radical change as that? I have before me the printed slip, with which the Senator from South Carolina has furnished us, containing the reasons which are suggested why these changes should be made. The reason which is suggested for the striking out of this entire page, found as it is both in the pending bill and in the existing law, is this: I read from page 4 of the printed slip:

On page 8, lines 4 to 9—

It evidently means from line 4, page 8, to line 9, page 9—

are stricken out, because the provision for mandamus is wholly covered on page 24, lines 14 to 22, inclusive.

We will turn to page 24 and find that and see. The reason given why not only this provision of the pending bill, but this most important and vital provision in the existing law shall be stricken out, is that there is found on page 24 of the pending bill, from line 14 to line 22, inclusive, the following language:

That the circuit and district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction, upon the application of the Attorney-General of the United States at the request of the Commission, alleging a failure to comply with or a violation of any of the provisions of said act to regulate commerce or of any act supplementary thereto or amendatory thereof by any common carrier, to issue a writ or writs of mandamus commanding such common carrier to comply with the provisions of said acts, or any of them.

In other words, the present law which is substantially, in fact almost verbatim, stated on page 8 of the pending bill, goes a great deal further than that, and specifies, in the first place, the jurisdiction in which any of these various suits may be filed for the purpose of compelling compliance with the provisions of this act. If Senators will read them—I will not read them again, as I have already read them in the hearing of the Senate—it will be seen that it is most important that the jurisdiction should be defined, because there are cases in which, in the absence of that specific definition of jurisdiction, it would be gravely doubted where the jurisdiction rested if any jurisdiction could be definitely fixed at all.

But that is not the most important part of it. On page 8, in line 18, it goes on further, now, to say what shall be the penalty or what consequences shall flow from the failure of a railroad company to comply with this provision about the publication and filing of schedules. It says this:

The failure to comply with its requirements—

That is, the requirement where the mandamus is issued—

shall be punishable as and for a contempt—

Which is left out of the provision found on page 24.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BACON. Just let me finish this, and I will, with pleasure.

and the said Commission, as complainant—

This is all left out—

may also apply, in any such circuit court of the United States, for a writ of injunction against such common carrier to restrain such common carrier from receiving or transporting property among the several States and Territories of the United States, or between the United States and adjacent foreign countries, or between ports of transshipment and of entry and the several States and Territories of the United States as mentioned in the first section of this act, until such common carrier shall have complied with the aforesaid provisions of this section of this act.

Now, all of that is omitted.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. BACON. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. The first thing I want to ask the Senator is whether, if a judge issues a writ of mandamus and the party disobeys it, the judge would not punish it as for contempt?

Mr. BACON. He might do it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Would he not?

Mr. BACON. I presume he would, but there are many——

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well. So to provide that the judge shall punish for contempt is not necessary. The second point in the amendment offered here is that instead of leaving it to the judge to declare by proceedings that the carrier must do so and so, Congress declares it right here; in other words, that the carrier shall not engage in interstate commerce unless it does file its rates.

Mr. BACON. That is stricken out.

Mr. TILLMAN. No indeed.

Mr. BACON. I beg pardon.

Mr. TILLMAN. Just read the substitute for it. The Senator was not paying attention.

Mr. BACON. Yes; I think I am paying attention.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Secretary read it again? It is stricken out, but there is nearly as much reinserted.

Mr. BACON. There is nothing here in the part to which the Senator calls my attention, and to which he says I have paid no attention, which provides for the filing by the Commission in the circuit court of a bill asking for a writ of injunction against a common carrier restraining it from engaging in interstate commerce.

Mr. TILLMAN. Nothing whatever, because on page 24 there is a general provision empowering the Commission to apply to the circuit court in the case of disobedience to any part of this act. Why do you want to specify that the court shall punish for one thing when there is a general provision authorizing the court to punish for disobedience to any section?

Mr. BACON. The Senator is mistaken. The provision on page 24 does not in any manner authorize the filing of a bill for the purpose of restraining the common carrier from continuing in interstate commerce so long as it disobeys this requirement of the law.

Mr. TILLMAN. By reason——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me, that I may finish the sentence. On the contrary, it limits the remedy entirely to that of mandamus. Under the law as it now exists and as it has existed for twenty years, the Commission is authorized to apply either for a mandamus or for a writ of injunction, and that which it is now proposed to strike out limits it to mandamus and entirely repeals that part of it. It not only strikes it out of the pending bill, but repeals existing law in the particular which authorizes the Commission to go into court and file a bill for the purpose of restraining a carrier from continuing in interstate commerce so long as it defiantly refuses to obey the plain mandate of the law.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. FULTON. I will ask the Senator from Georgia if under the bill as it is proposed to be amended, where the provision is made——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is obliged to inform the Senator from Georgia that his time has expired.

Mr. FULTON. I should like to have the Senator answer my question.

Mr. TILLMAN (to Mr. FULTON). It is now your time; go on.

Mr. FULTON. I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that the proposed amendment makes it unlawful for a carrier that has failed to file its schedules to continue in interstate commerce, and a violation of that provision would subject it to the penalties in other portions of the bill. There would be that remedy. The carrier could be prosecuted criminally if it engaged in carrying interstate commerce after refusing to file its schedules. In addition to that is given the right to proceed against it by mandamus and compel compliance. There are two remedies. Surely they would seem to be sufficient.

Mr. BACON. Well, they may be sufficient in the opinion of the Senator, and I presume they are sufficient in the opinion of the Senator from South Carolina, but still the fact remains as I have stated it. I presume the Senator from Oregon is asking me a question so that I can reply in his time. The fact is, as I have stated it, that under existing law there is the additional security given which authorizes the Commission to file a bill to restrain a railroad from continuing in interstate commerce until they comply with the mandate of the law. For what reason that additional security should be stricken out I am not able to find out from the explanation which has been made by any of the Senators.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I concur in the main in the views expressed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I think the substitute recommended by the Commission in lieu of what is in the bill and what is in the existing law will dilute the effect of the law and make it less effective. By turning to the original bill you will notice that there are two remedies conferred, one by mandamus and the other by injunction, to compel the carrier to file and publish his schedule of rates. While it is true that the remedy by mandamus may be preserved in the bill on page 24, yet certainly the remedy by injunction is not preserved in clear terms. In the paragraph prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission and presented by the Senator from South Carolina, there is this language:

> No carrier shall, unless otherwise provided by this act, engage or participate in the transportation of passengers or property, as defined in the first section of this act, unless the rates, fares, and charges upon which the same are transported by said carrier have been filed and published, etc.

It provides no remedy. Now, in the provision that is stricken out there is a remedy. I will read a portion of it.

> And the said Commission, as complainant, may also apply—

That is, they may first apply by mandamus to compel the railroad to file and publish the rates, and, if they fail to obey, have them adjudged in contempt. Then it adds:

> in any such circuit court of the United States, for a writ of injunction against such common carrier to restrain such common carrier from receiving or transporting property among the several States and Territories of the United States, or between the United States and adjacent foreign countries, or between ports of transshipment and of entry and the several States and Territories of the United States as mentioned in the first section of this act, until such common carrier shall have complied with the aforesaid provisions of this section of this act.

It goes further than the proposed amendment. The proposed amendment prohibits them from engaging in interstate commerce until they file and publish such rates, but it does not go on and prescribe a clear and efficacious method of enforcing it.

Under the bill as it remains, and that I understand is practically the law, the Interstate Commerce Commission can go into a court of equity and by complaint apply for a writ of injunction and have the carrier restrained from doing interstate-commerce business until it is ready to comply with the order, and that is the most efficacious remedy there is.

So, taking the two propositions together, I think the provisions as they are in the bill are much stronger and more effective and ought to be retained. I say this with all due respect to the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina. [Putting the question.] By the sound——

Mr. TILLMAN. I dislike to put the Senate to the trouble of calling the roll, but I am very certain that this proposed amendment is merely to strike out surplusage in the act; because with a general remedy provided on page 24, prescribing punishment for any disobedience to this act, there is no use for this provision at this point.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that both Senators have already spoken to this amendment, and under the rule, strictly construed——

Mr. TILLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TELLER. Let us have the amendment read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, beginning in line 4, strike out the remainder of the section and insert:

> No carrier shall, unless otherwise provided by this act, engage or participate in the transportation of passengers or property, as defined in the first section of this act, unless the rates, fares, and charges upon which the same are transported by said carrier have been filed and published in accordance with the provisions of this section; nor shall any carrier charge or demand or collect or receive a greater or less or different compensation for such transportation of passengers or property, or for any service in connection therewith, between the points named in such tariffs than the rates, fares, and charges which are specified in the tariff filed and in effect at the time; nor shall any carrier refund or remit in any manner or by any device any portion of the rates, fares, and charges so specified, nor extend to any shipper or person any privileges or facilities in the transportation of passengers or property, except such as are specified in such tariffs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read.

Mr. TELLER. I want to know whether that is a part of the amendment which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] withdrew.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, this has no connection with the Senator's amendment. It is an amendment offered by me, coming from the Interstate Commerce Commission, and explained in the memorandum. The substitute here enacts into law what the Commission would otherwise obtain only by judicial process. We enact into the law what is forbidden; and if you leave the law like it is, you can not keep these people from engaging in interstate commerce without going to the court, whereas under this amendment Congress prohibits a public carrier from engaging in interstate commerce unless it does publish its rates, and then the provision on page 24 provides punishment for any disobedience of the act.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me to be rather late to make radical changes in the bill. We have been led to suppose that the bill as it came from the House was the bill which we would be called to vote upon, except some amendments which were to be offered to it, not amendments in the way of emendations from the bill, but additions to the bill. I do not know but that this will make it better. In fact, I think, to tell the honest truth about it, that almost anything would make the original bill better than it is. But at the same time I should like to have this proceeding go on in such a way that we would know what kind of a bill we have got. I suppose when these amendments are adopted, if they are adopted (without anybody knowing what they are or what their effect is), we will have an opportunity in the Senate to continue the debate indefinitely. It seems to me, if we are to go on and add new things we had supposed were settled, we will open the door for absolutely unlimited debate on this subject, and it will take you till next month to get through with this bill. If there is necessity for this class of amendments, I am quite contented that they shall be made, but I should like to know what evil in this bill is to be cured by this class of amendments.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to seem to criticise the Senator, but that has been explained twice, and if he did not hear it because he was out of the Chamber, at lunch or somewhere else, I can not help it.

Mr. TELLER. A man can not stay here all the time, and I think I stay here as many hours as any other Senator on the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will try to explain it, if the Senator will hold the floor. I have been notified that I have consumed my time. I have already explained it twice.

Mr. TELLER. This is an unusual method. It is not the custom to debate a bill for three months, and then at the last moment have these amendments come in without any opportunity to know what they are. It is not unreasonable that a Senator who has given some attention to the bill should like to know why these changes are made, and whether they are necessary to be made. He might inquire, I think properly, why they were not made thirty or sixty days ago. Now, I will hear any suggestion the Senator from South Carolina wishes to make.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator has already been informed that this bill was not considered in committee at all. While it was in committee it was never considered with any view to amendment or change, and all the debate we have had in the Senate has been largely on the court-review proposition and the proposition to prohibit the issuance of injunctions suspending the Commission rates. We have not discussed the balance of the bill at all in the Senate, and we never discussed it in the committee.

Mr. TELLER. I do not mean to criticise the Senator who has this bill in charge. I know the difficulties he has had presented to him. I know there was some difference in committee, and that the bill came to us from the committee without any change recommended by the committee.

For myself I want to say now, because I may not have another chance to say it, in my opinion, it is an exceedingly bungling bill from beginning to end. It seems to me it might have been changed in committee, and it also seems to me it might have been changed in the Senate within the last three months. I think it needs some change. I was led to suppose from the silence in reference to some of these amendments at least that they had been settled.

It is not the usual method of dealing with a subject. We repeat in this bill the law that now exists, and then make changes in it. I do not want to make any disturbance or delay anything, but I shall reserve the right to go and get lunch and not be criticised because I did not hear what the Senator from South Carolina said in my absence.

Mr. BACON. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Colorado.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. BACON. I simply want to call his attention to the fact that the particular point at issue here is that the act of 1887 provides that under certain circumstances, where a railroad company fail to file certain schedules, the Commission may go into court to enjoin them from proceeding with interstate business until they comply with the law, and that this amendment strikes that out and at no other place does it insert anything in lieu hereof. This is the point I make.

Mr. TELLER. Then it does not seem to me that it is an improvement on existing law.

Mr. BACON. I am opposed to the amendment for that reason.

Mr. ALDRICH and others. Question!

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, before the vote is taken upon the amendment, I should like to understand the theory of it better than I do now. I hope I may be permitted to say that, like the Senator from Colorado, I can not stay on duty in the Capitol more than eight or ten hours without taking my eye off a particular thing. I was out of the Chamber for a few moments, meeting a delegation of my own people who are here to see me upon business that is being considered in a committee, and for that reason I did not hear the explanation which has been offered by the Senator from South Carolina of an amendment which deprives this bill of one of the remedies provided. I hope he or some one else who is behind this amendment will kindly explain it. I believe I have fifteen minutes, and I will be glad, if I can, to yield it for that purpose.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I want first to apologize to the Senator from Colorado, if the Senator from Virginia will permit me, for having indicated that it was impossible for me to explain to Senators who kept going in and out and who on returning to the Chamber had missed hearing an explanation. I am not criticising the Senator from Virginia or anybody else. The Senator says he can not remain in the Capitol on duty more than eight or ten hours. It has been my misfortune to have to remain on duty, regardless of my own feelings or anything else, whenever this bill was up, and I have tried to do so.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to say that I have been here whenever the Senator from South Carolina has been, and oftener, too, and I do not wish anything I say to be disparaged by being brought in contact with anybody else. I have no doubt that every Senator is trying to do his duty as best he can.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was trying to apologize to the Senator by saying that I can not explain it to Senators unless they are here. I twice tried to explain it. I will try now for the third time.

Mr. DANIEL. Everyone knows he can not hear when he is not present.

Mr. TILLMAN. The purpose of all these amendments which have been inserted—a good many things have been put in since the Senator went away—is to perfect the language and the structure. The law as it now stands is involved and contradictory, because they dovetailed the act of 1889 and the act of 1887 together. Then the Elkins law has come along and imposed punishments for things that are provided for here. This very provision here about injunction and mandamus, which the Senator will find on page 8, the line proposed to be stricken out, is to compel a carrier to publish his rates, and if he does not publish them the Commission may go into court and, by mandamus or injunction proceedings, prohibit him from entering into interstate commerce.

The amendment which I have offered here, coming from the Interstate Commerce Commission, by an act of Congress provides that a man shall not engage in interstate commerce unless he does publish his tariff. Then the punishment for a disobedience of this provision is to be found on page 24, where the penalty clauses of the entire bill come in, and any obedience to any of its parts is provided for.

If Senators want to provide, in addition to the mandamus proceeding provided on page 24, for injunction proceedings and punishment for contempt, I submit to them they can do it there and preserve the two classes of punishments just as well as to put it in here and then go on over there and put it in again. It is already in over there.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. DANIEL. I give up the floor.

Mr. BACON. Is it not true——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island will state his question of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. The construction which is being put upon the rule and understanding is such that Senators make four or five different speeches upon the same question right along under the guise of asking a question of somebody. The Senator from Georgia has made three or four speeches since I have been in the Chamber.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from South Carolina has certainly made three in the last half hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the Senator from Georgia has exhausted his rights under the rule.

Mr. BACON. I only want to ask a question and not to make an argument.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have already been taken down. I would be willing to get down and stay down if I could get the bill through. The Senator from Virginia took the floor. When he sat down, that cut me off and it cut off the Senator from Georgia, and nobody has a right to speak unless it is some one who has not spoken on the amendment.

Mr. BACON. I have twice attempted to ask the Senator this question, and it has been objected to by others, and this particular question has never been asked.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired, under the rule. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that it may be again stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again stated.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I think I can explain this matter in a few words. This section cuts out the writ of mandamus, but the writ of mandamus is provided for on page 24. It does not provide any penalties, because the Elkins Act provides the penalties. Now, when we come to page 24 we can incorporate the injunction. That is the proper place for it to be incorporated, because that applies to a violation of any section at all of the act.

Mr. BAILEY. Does not the Senator from Maryland think that when Congress makes a given act unlawful an injunction would lie against it unless expressly forbidden?

Mr. RAYNER. I was just going to say that there is no necessity for providing for a writ of injunction. If the act makes a thing unlawful, of course you can enjoin; but if you have it specifically provided for, the place to provide for it is on page 24, because that provides for a mandamus against any violation, and we can add to it an injunction for any violation, and then you have the penalties of the Elkins Act. So you have the mandamus, you have the injunction, and you have the penalties, and I do not think you want anything more.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Chair, I desire to state that I will be content if the provision is put into the section as the Senator from Maryland indicates.

Mr. RAYNER. I will offer it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to immediately follow the amendment just adopted.

Mr. LONG. I call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that he has one other amendment not yet acted upon. The words at the top of page 9 should be stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That portion has been stricken out.

Mr. TILLMAN. From the top of the page to the end of the section has been stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 2 the following:

That in time of war or threatened war preference and precedence shall, upon the representation of the President of the United States of the need therefor, be given, over all other traffic, to the transportation of troops and material of war, and carriers shall adopt every means within their control to facilitate and expedite the military traffic.

Mr. WARREN. I think there can be no objection to the amendment. The War Department regards it as absolutely necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in at the end of section 2.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just adopted insert as section 2a:

SEC. 2a. That there be added after section 6 of said act a new section, to be known as section 6a, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 6a. Every person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor who shall, directly or indirectly, do, or cause, procure, or solicit to be done, or assist, aid, or abet in the doing of any of the following acts, namely: Any act of unjust discrimination as defined in this act, any fraudulent act or false representation by which transportation is obtained or attempted to be obtained at less than the lawfully established rate. Said misdemeanors shall be punishable by imprisonment at hard labor not more than five years nor less than one year or by fine not exceeding $20,000 nor less than $1,000."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Wisconsin, which has just been read.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the amendment which I offer imposes the penalty of imprisonment from one to five years for any act of unjust discrimination, as defined in the interstate-commerce act and the Elkins law amendatory thereof. It makes no change in the punishment by fine provided in the Elkins law, which is from one thousand to twenty thousand dollars. My amendment proposes the additional alternative penalty of imprisonment for violations of the law, now punishable by fine only.

It is the experience of mankind that respect for law is in some degree dependent upon the penalties imposed for its violation. The penalty must be severe enough to deter those disposed to violate its provisions from incurring the risk of so doing. It is a matter of small concern to the railroad to pay a fine for lawbreaking when they can exact the money from the public to meet the payment. The railroad official shrinks from serving a term of imprisonment. The testimony taken by the committees of Congress and the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission bear witness to the fact that the railroad companies of the country undertook very soon after the enactment of the law of 1887 to have stricken out of that law the penalties of imprisonment provided for its violation. The Interstate Commerce Commission appeared from time to time before the committees of Congress and opposed the change. Notwithstanding this, the change was made when the Elkins law was enacted in 1903. Since that time violations of the interstate-commerce law have been punishable by fine only.

As early as 1891 the Interstate Commerce Commission, in opposing the repeal of the penalty of imprisonment, said:

The imposition of criminal penalties upon railway officials, as well as the corporation itself, where such officials participate in a violation of the law is unquestionably a wise and salutary feature of the act. Indeed, in those cases where punishment by imprisonment is prescribed, such punishment can, in the nature of things, be inflicted only on a real individual or natural person, and not on the abstract entity or artificial person, like a corporation.

In 1894, in meeting the arguments of the representatives of the corporations who were endeavoring to secure the abolition of the imprisonment feature of the interstate-commerce act, the Commission said:

In this connection we may properly allude to certain modifications of the penal provisions of the act which are advocated by many railroad managers. It is proposed by them to exempt the officers and employees of carrying corporations from criminal liability for rate cutting and similar offenses, and to impose such liabilities solely upon the corporations themselves. In brief, the argument is that the extreme severity of the present law operates to prevent its enforcement; that railway managers will not give information against their rivals when the consequence might be the imprisonment of individuals with whom their personal relations are friendly and familiar, but that such disclosures would be freely made if they resulted only in the imposition of a fine upon the offending corporations. We are not prepared to indorse this view. Corporations can act only through their officers and agents, and necessarily an offense against business rectitude and public morality must be committed by some individual who has knowledge of the law, and consciously transgresses its provision. The wrongdoing now referred to involves, in our judgment, a high degree of moral turpitude, which should rightfully subject to exposure and punishment the persons who are guilty of it. We believe that the corporations should themselves be indictable, and regard it a mistake of the present statute that they are not, but we also believe that their officers and agents should remain amenable, as they are now, to the penal obligations of the law. This view includes retention of the imprisonment feature in the tenth section.

These were indeed strong reasons for retaining the penalty which the railroads were so eager to have stricken from the law. And the argument of the Commission did prevail for a time, but the railroad managers were insistent and the Elkins law eliminated imprisonment as a penalty.

Mr. President, I anticipate if there be any discussion of this matter at all, it may be asserted, as it has been heretofore in this debate, that the Interstate Commerce Commission and other advocates of additional legislation have given their approval to the Elkins law. It is possible, sir, to quote general indorsement of the Elkins law from the testimony of members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and from their annual reports to Congress as well. It is not possible to quote from them any specific indorsement of the amendment abolishing the penalty of imprisonment for violations of the law.

As evidence of the fact that repeal of the penalty of imprisonment invites to further violation of the law, I cite the facts discovered by experts who examined the books of the Wisconsin railroad companies.

The Elkins law was approved on the 19th of February, 1903. Under an act of the legislature of Wisconsin expert accountants were authorized to investigate the books of railroad companies doing business in that State. That investigation began, or was noticed to begin, on the 1st of October, 1903. That was seven months after the Elkins law went into effect. The investigation discloses that the rebates paid by a single company doing business in Wisconsin were as follows:

In January, 1903—I state it only in round numbers—$37,000; in February, $57,000; March, $47,000; April, $36,000; May, $25,000; June, $13,000; July, $101,000; August, $32,000; September, $46,000. The investigation began in October, the payment of rebates for that month fell off to $9,000, and in November to $600, and in December to $2,000. The investigation discloses that one of the railroad companies of that State paid something more than twice as much in rebates to shippers in Wisconsin during the year following the enactment of the Elkins law as they had paid the preceding year.

What was true of Wisconsin is true of other States. The result was inevitable. If the law is to be respected and upheld, those who violate it must be made to suffer such penalties as will cause them to heed and obey its mandates.

If we expect the prohibitions of the interstate-commerce act to be effective, then we should restore imprisonment as a punishment, and I believe increase the term of years imposed as a penalty for its violation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before the question is put on this amendment, I desire merely to say that I have an amendment pending which I intend to move at the proper time at the end of the bill, which provides for the restoration of the penal clauses of the original act of 1887, which were repealed in the Elkins law, which I think ought to be restored, and which I think go quite far enough.

Mr. STONE. I should like to have the pending amendment read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will be again read.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Before it is read, Mr. President, I wish in response to a suggestion, which I think a good one, to incorporate in line 9, after the word "which" and before the word "transportation," the words "interstate and foreign commerce."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin as modified.

The SECRETARY. After line 5, page 9, insert as a new section to be known as section 2a, to read as follows:

SEC. 2a. That there be added after section 6 of said act a new section, to be known as section 6, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 6a. Every person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor who shall, directly or indirectly, do, or cause, procure, or solicit to be done, or assist, aid, or abet in the doing of any of the following acts, namely: Any act of unjust discrimination as defined in this act, any fraudulent act or false representation by which interstate and foreign commerce transportation is obtained or attempted to be obtained at less than the lawfully established rate. Said misdemeanors shall be punishable by imprisonment at hard labor not more than five years nor less than one year or by fine not exceeding $20,000 nor less than $1,000."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LODGE. If this amendment should be voted down, would it then be in order for me to offer my amendment at the end of the bill, where I have proposed that it should come in as a new section?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator's amendment would be in order at the end of the section should the pending amendment be voted down.

Mr. LODGE. My amendment provides for adding a new section. It seemed to me that the proper place for it to come in was at the end of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the amendment would be in order.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts what is the number of the amendment to which he refers?

Mr. LODGE. It is on page 141 of the pamphlet of amendments.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I suggest that it be read at the desk, so that we can all hear it.

Mr. LODGE. I can state it in one moment, if the Senator from Indiana desires me to do so.

Mr. STONE. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. It simply amends the Elkins law in such way as to restore the penal clauses of the act of 1887. The Elkins law repealed the penal clauses of the act of 1887, which provided for imprisonment as well as for fines, and which were enforced some thirteen years. My proposed section simply amends the Elkins Act so as to restore the old clauses.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I prepared and offered an amendment to the same general effect as that outlined in the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]—an amendment to the Elkins law, intending to restore the imprisonment clauses; so that, whatever the phraseology may be, the purpose of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts and the one which I have presented differs very slightly, in my opinion.

Mr. President, I think I will not say anything now beyond this, that I feel that the imprisonment clauses, the penalty clauses, of the statute ought to be restored. To say that a person violating this specific law can not be convicted is to impeach the capacity and efficiency of the judiciary. I see no reason why a conviction can not be had, and the penalty of imprisonment imposed, if the facts put in evidence sustain the allegations of the indictment; and I have no doubt in my mind that the fear of imprisonment will have a far more restraining influence upon those who are in charge of these great carrying lines and contribute more to the observance of the law than the fear of a mere fine paid out, ultimately at least, of the treasury of the corporation. I believe, Mr. President, that one conviction followed by one imprisonment would afford a deterrent example of infinitely more importance than a dozen convictions followed by a mere fine.

I shall vote to disagree to the amendment now pending, with the intention of voting to restore all the penal clauses of the act of 1887.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, for the purpose of letting everyone see the difference in the minds of Senators as disclosed by these amendments for enlarging the penalties, and for the reason stated by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], I ask that the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] may be stated at the desk. It is very brief, I understand.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, my amendment does not include the penal clauses. It restores them. It repeals the repealing clause of the Elkins Act.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I mean that.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator desires to know the difference, he should have the original act of 1887 read. I presume the Secretary has it at the desk. It is on pages 7 and 8, section 10 of the act as amended March 2, 1889.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If it comprises as much as two pages, I shall not ask to have it read.

Mr. LODGE. It is a long section.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Could the Senator not in a few sentences state the difference between his proposition, the proposition of the Senator from Missouri, and the old law?

Mr. LODGE. The old law, as I understand, provided for the imposition of a fine not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding two years, or both.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then I should be very glad to have from the managers of the bill, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], a statement as to which provision they think preferable.

Mr. HOPKINS. They may not favor either.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Indiana agree to vote for the one which I favor?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator wants to put it on me to determine, I will ask him if he will vote for the one which I favor?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that his opinion would probably be very influential, but not entirely conclusive. Perhaps, however, if joined with the opinion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] it might well be conclusive.

Mr. TILLMAN. I shall be glad to get either amendment; but I should prefer this one, because it is shorter and a little harsher.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just to say this, that the language in which my amendment is framed is the language of the recommendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, with an amendment which I suggested here a little time ago, excepting as to the amendment increasing the penalty of the act of 1887, as already stated by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts in his opinion would it not be best to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and perfect it by adding the provisions of the amendment he offers?

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President; I should say not.

Mr. GALLINGER. That would put them in prison twice.

Mr. LODGE. I think we had much better restore the old clauses of the act of 1887, which seem to me quite sufficient to meet the purpose. It is the fact of imprisonment, not the length of the term, that would be effective. I think the old law is amply sufficient, and I think it is necessary for the same reason as stated by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will permit me a moment in his time, I said that I felt inclined to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]; but, upon reflection, I feel rather inclined to vote for it, and then with a view of perfecting it by adding——

Mr. LODGE. I mention this amendment of mine because I wish to say that I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, which I think is too extreme and unnecessary. I think the old law which has been in existence, as I have said, for seventeen years is quite sufficient.

It seems to me also I may say, before I take my seat, that the proper place to put this clause is at the end of the bill as a new section. The new section that I have proposed reenacts the provisions of the Elkins law in certain other respects, but repeals the repealing clause and makes all of the offenses subject to the penalties prescribed in section 10 of the act of 1887.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Before the Senator from Massachusetts yields the floor will he permit me to ask him a question, as I can not now take the floor in my own right?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think I was misunderstood in stating that the language of my amendment is in all respects the language recommended by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I will say that the penalty which was provided in the amendment which I offered is, so far as the imprisonment is concerned, a severer penalty than that suggested by the Interstate Commerce Commission in its recommendation of 1887. The fine recommended by the Interstate Commerce Commission the last time they submitted a recommendation upon this specific paragraph was only $5,000. Since that time the Elkins law has increased the fine to $20,000 as the maximum limit. Therefore, and for that reason, I have incorporated in this amendment the same fine that is provided in the Elkins law, but adopted an imprisonment penalty which I believe would be severe enough to command the respect of the railroad companies themselves.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Before the Chair puts the question, he will say that under the Chair's interpretation of the unanimous-consent agreement a Senator can not speak in the time of another Senator if he has already occupied the floor in his own right.

The question is——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall be glad to withdraw my remarks, Mr. President. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, is the amendment open to amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is open to amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, I move, in line 5 of the amendment, after the word "indirectly," to insert the word "willfully."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "indirectly," in line 5, it is proposed to insert the word "willfully;" so as to read:

SEC. 6a. Every person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor who shall, directly or indirectly, willfully do, or cause, procure, or solicit to be done, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I do not wish this question to go to a vote without a brief statement. It comes before the Senate somewhat in the shape of a criticism against the legislation of 1903, and I think it is due to the Senate and to the House of Representatives to say that there were before Congress at that time very good reasons for a modification of the penal provisions of the interstate-commerce act.

It is all very well to talk about the severity of these penalties, but the naked and very instructive fact is that from 1887 to 1903 the severity of these penalties had not resulted in the conviction or incarceration of anybody for a violation of this law, and unless I am greatly out of the way the impression was made upon Congress in 1903 that the difficulty of discovering these offenses, all of them secret in their character, was so greatly increased by these severe penalties that, in the opinion of wise and good people, the law would be made more effective if the penalties were abandoned and the prosecution maintained for the imposition of fines on the corporation offending.

I think it also ought to be said in explanation of the action of Congress that, for the first time in the history of our interstate-commerce legislation—since 1903—the Government, by its criminal prosecutions, has succeeded in making any impression upon the secret criminal practices of the railway.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is the Senator aware of the fact, I should like to inquire, that the Federal judge in whose court the Burlington Railway Company was convicted a week or two ago, in imposing a penalty of only a fine said——

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I will say that I saw that statement in the newspapers.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The statement was that if there was a provision for imprisonment in the penitentiary, much more in the way of insuring obedience to the law might be accomplished.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I saw that, and I am not out of sympathy with the proposition the Senator has presented.

I have already suggested to my colleagues here that I will not hesitate to vote for this amendment, but I regret that it has been presented in the form of a criticism of what Congress has done.

It is also a mistake to say that the criminal provisions of the statute have been entirely eliminated. All of these offenses are in the nature of conspiracies to violate the law, and the indictments which have been found by the grand jury in New York against the trunk lines in connection with the sugar-trust rebates have taken the form of indictments for conspiracy to violate the law, which does carry the penalty of imprisonment as well as fine.

I think the most amazing fact in connection with our railway experience has been the utter indifference to these provisions of the law by the managers of these great properties. Only a year ago one of the most important and influential and, I will add, one of the most reputable railway presidents in the country told me that it was ridiculous to expect the railroads to obey the law on the subject of rebates; and his remark, intended partly as a jest, aroused my indignation. My theory is that the enforcement of these laws does not depend altogether upon penalties, whether fine or imprison. The enforcement of these laws and the obedience of railway managers to the requirements of these acts of Congress rest largely in an aroused public opinion throughout the United States that shall bring these great representatives of property interests to that same respect for the statutes that ordinary people have in the United States.

I have not risen, therefore, to object to the restoration of these penalties, but simply to say a word in explanation of the course which Congress has taken from time to time in the matter and to emphasize a conviction that has been growing upon me that our market place will be delivered from these crimes when the public opinion of the community comes up to the help of these enactments of Congress.

Mr. LODGE. Before the Senator sits down I should like to ask him one question. Of course most of us took part in the legislation of 1903, and if there is any criticism of my proposition to restore the penal clauses it falls on me quite as much as on any other Senator who voted for it; but is it not true that the Department of Justice believe now that it will be for the advantage of the law and its enforcement to restore the penal clauses?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I understand so. I did not rise for the purpose of disputing that. I think that the close scrutiny of the books and accounts of railway companies provided for in this bill will tend to reveal these crimes which for twenty years were almost inscrutable to the officers of the law. I shall vote very cheerfully to restore these penalties, because I believe that the most serious feature of the railway situation has been the acquiescence of the public, practically by common consent, in this negligence and contempt of the law.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator state which of the provisions he prefers—the one of the Senator from Wisconsin or the other?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I expect to vote for the one offered by the Senator from Wisconsin because that is vigorous, and I have not seen the other or even heard it read.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am somewhat surprised to hear the Senator from Iowa say that the railroad managers of this country have been negligent in observing the law, because that implies that the officers whose duty it is to enforce the law are more culpable than the railroad managers themselves. I have yet to learn that in this country the law is to be enforced by those whose misdeeds it is intended to punish, and when it is admitted that the railroad managers have not obeyed the law, it must be because the officers of the Government have not properly enforced it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I used the word "negligent" as applied to these people inadvertently. Of course I regard the violation of the law as a crime, but the Senator will not deny that the crime is in its very nature such as may elude the eye of the law and go unwhipped through the whole machinery of justice which we have had for the last twenty years.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am afraid that the offenses of all rich criminals elude the vigilant eye of the law too often, and I want to see the time come in this country when the richer a man is the more certain it will be that he is punished every time he violates the law of the land——

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have no controversy with the Senator about that.

Mr. BAILEY. Because upon them rests the highest obligation to obey the law. The man of little consequence and of less property owes the law small gratitude for its protection. He feels the Government only when he is summoned to serve upon its juries or called to fight its battles. He never knows what it is to have its officers called to protect his property, and therefore he can be partially excused when he does not respond with alacrity to the call for the protection of the property of other people. But the men who manage the railroads and who conduct the great enterprises of this country owe to the respect for the law and to the obedience of the law the protection of every dollar's worth of property they own; and it is an amazing circumstance to me that those who are the most deeply interested in the supremacy of the law should be the ones who openly admit their repeated and flagrant violations of it.

Restore these penalties, put two of these railroad managers in the penitentiary, and their fate will become a warning to all others. As certain as the swift vengeance of the law shall fall on some the others will desist from their offenses. They love money well enough to take the chances of losing some in the hope of making more, but the rich and prosperous will not take the chance of punishment in the penitentiary. If they can not be brought, out of respect for the law, to obey it, let us put them in the common jail, where they will be powerless to defy it at least for a season.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] the amendment which I have heretofore submitted. It appears on page 141 of the pamphlet amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts moves as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] as amended, the amendment heretofore submitted by him. The proposed substitute will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment as amended it is proposed to insert the following:

Section 1 of an act entitled "An act to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States," approved February 19, 1903, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That anything done or omitted to be done by a corporation common carrier, subject to the act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof, which, if done or omitted to be done by any director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by such corporation, would constitute a misdemeanor under said acts or under this act, shall also be held to be a misdemeanor committed by such corporation, and upon conviction thereof it shall be subject to like penalties as are prescribed in said acts or by this act with reference to such persons except as such penalties are herein changed. The willful failure upon the part of any carrier subject to said acts to file and publish the tariffs or rates and charges as required by said acts or strictly to observe such tariffs until changed according to law shall be a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof the corporation offending shall be subject to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000 for each offense; and it shall be unlawful for any person, persons, or corporation to offer, grant, or give or to solicit, accept, or receive any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect of the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce by any common carrier subject to said act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereto whereby any such property shall by any device whatever be transported at a less rate than that named in the tariffs published and filed by such carrier, as is required by said act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereto, or whereby any other advantage is given or discrimination is practiced. Every person or corporation who shall offer, grant, or give or solicit, accept, or receive any such rebates, concession, or discrimination shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subject to the fines and penalties prescribed in section 10 of the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, as amended by the act approved March 2, 1899.

"Every violation of this section shall be prosecuted in any court of the United States having jurisdiction of crimes within the district in which such violation was committed or through which the transportation may have been conducted; and whenever the offense is begun in one jurisdiction and completed in another it may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in either jurisdiction in the same manner as if the offense had been actually and wholly committed therein.

"In construing and enforcing the provisions of this section the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any common carrier acting within the scope of his employment shall in every case be also deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such carrier as well as that of the person. Whenever any carrier files with the Interstate Commerce Commission or publishes a particular rate under the provisions of the act to regulate commerce or acts amendatory thereto, or participates in any rates so filed or published, that rate as against such carrier, its officers, or agents in any prosecution begun under this act shall be conclusively deemed to be the legal rate, and any departure from such rate, or any offer to depart therefrom, shall be deemed to be an offense under this section of this act."

Mr. KNOX. Is an amendment to the proposed substitute now in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands not.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, very much like the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], I do not rise to oppose the amendment of this bill so as to provide the penalty of imprisonment for the violation of the interstate-commerce act or any provision of this bill, if we should see fit to make it a law; but I rise, rather, as he did, to point out how it came that in the legislation known as the "Elkins law," enacted February 19, 1903, we abolished this penalty of imprisonment.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], speaking on that same point a few moments ago, took occasion to say that the Interstate Commerce Commission had never recommended the abolishment of the penalty of imprisonment. Technically and strictly speaking, that is probably true; but on another occasion I called attention to the fact that in the Seventeenth Annual Report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was a report published immediately after the Elkins law was enacted, the Commission took occasion, speaking of that law, to use this language, to which I call the attention of Senators.

Speaking of the Elkins law, the Commission, in the first report after the Elkins law was enacted, said:

The amended law has abolished the penalty of imprisonment, and the only punishment now provided is the imposition of fines. As the corporation can not be imprisoned or otherwise punished for misdemeanors than by money penalties, it was deemed expedient that no greater punishment be visited upon the offending officer or agent. The various arguments in favor of this change have been stated in former reports and need not here be repeated.

I submit that the language thus employed by the Commission indicates what the fact was, that the Commission had a distinct and positive relation to the enactment of the Elkins law. The members of that Commission appeared before the Interstate Commerce Committee, as every member of that committee knows, and every member of that committee knows also that every member of the Interstate Commerce Commission who appeared before that committee represented that there should be that change made in the law.

When I spoke here on another occasion and called attention to that fact, I relied upon the expression made by the Commission in this report, that they had repeatedly in former reports expressed the argument in favor of this change. I relied upon that, and made the statement that they had repeatedly, in their former reports, made that recommendation. I have since then looked through their former reports, and I do not find their former recommendations as strong as I had supposed I would find them from what they had said when they appeared before the Interstate Commerce Committee, and from what they said in their report following the enactment of that legislation. But

I call attention to the fact that in the twelfth annual report, at page 19, speaking of the difficulty of enforcing the law, they say:

If it is asked why the criminal remedies are not applied, the answer is that they have been, and without success. The most earnest efforts have been made by the Commission and by prosecuting officers in various parts of the United States to punish infractions of this law. While some fines have been imposed, no substantial effect has been produced. It is plain to the Commission that satisfactory results can not be obtained from this course. The difficulties in the way of securing legal evidence necessary to a conviction are such as to be in most cases insurmountable. The fact may be morally certain, but the name, the date, the amount can not be shown with the particularity and certainty required by the criminal law.

And so they went on at length. In other reports they have repeated substantially the same statement, calling attention to the fact that in criminal prosecutions to enforce the law it was necessary to prove a violation of the law, according to the rules governing in the trial of criminal prosecutions, beyond a reasonable doubt. That is what they had been unable to do. Therefore they appealed to us to make the law one they could enforce and asked us to abolish the provision providing for imprisonment as one of the penalties.

Now, that is exactly how that proposition came before the Interstate Commerce Committee, as every member of the committee knows. So far as I am aware, no railroad had anything whatever to do with it or even any knowledge of it, although they may have been fully informed. I remember that the very same argument that is repeated here in these reports was made before the committee, and the committee, in passing upon the Elkins law and repealing imprisonment as one of the penalties for a violation of the interstate-commerce act, supposed they were acting in the line of the recommendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the recommendations of which body the committee was disposed to follow, so far as I can remember the consideration of that legislation in committee.

Whether that was wise or not, I do not intend to stop to discuss. I remember that I doubted the wisdom of the change at the time when it was done. I think every member of that committee would testify that on my part it was with great reluctance that I reached the conclusion that we ought to favor the abolition of imprisonment for a violation of the law. I was one of the very last to yield to it; but I did, out of deference to the opinion of the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, because I thought I could understand how it was that they would have difficulty in proving beyond a reasonable doubt in that character of cases the offense for which a man might be indicted.

Another argument that was used was that it did not follow that violators of the law would go free from imprisonment, but that by providing, as we did in the Elkins law, that when it was charged that rebates were being given or other practices were being indulged in, in violation of the law, it should be prohibited by injunction; then, if there should be a further such violation, it would be an act in contempt of court, for which the party could be summoned before the court, when he could be tried for contempt without the difficulty attending a criminal trial, where everything must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, and imprisonment for contempt could be imposed and the result would be far more efficacious and far more expeditious than it was under the other law.

Now, in another report—I can not tell precisely which one, but I read it only a few days ago; I think it must be about the fourteenth or the fifteenth; I have been unable to put my hand on it, but I know it is in one of them—the Interstate Commerce Commission, speaking on this point, in a report to Congress, said while as a Commission they could not recommend that we abolish imprisonment for a violation of the law, yet they would say that if Congress saw fit to do it there was not a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission who would interpose any objection, because their experience had been such that they would not feel warranted in doing so. Almost that precise language was employed by the Commission.

Therefore I say enough appears in this seventeenth annual report, following immediately after the Elkins law, in which they say it was thought expedient thus to legislate because of the argument which had repeatedly before that time been set out in their reports, to justify us in assuming, without any testimony to the contrary, that the Interstate Commerce Commission did favor exactly this change in the law. They not only favored it, as they stated in the report, by fair interpretation, but they favored it positively and aggressively, as every member of the Interstate Commerce Committee knows, by appearing before that committee and making statements to that effect.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Ohio is giving very interesting testimony on this point. I wish to ask him if the Interstate Commerce Commission, at any time since then, has asked to have the penalty of imprisonment restored?

Mr. FORAKER. Never; never since then; and, as the Senator from Iowa well says, Mr. President, everything that is being done to-day to break up the practices about which complaint is made is being done under the Elkins law, and the very best legislation we can enact here is to broaden and strengthen the Elkins law so as to make it still more effective, as we easily can. If we have in view only the correction of evils, that is the sure way to reach them.

Take the report made by Commissioner Garfield a few days ago. I read it through with care, in so far as we have been favored with it. Assuming that all he says is true, about which I do not know anything except that his facts are disputed to some extent, but, assuming for the sake of the argument that they are all true, there is not one thing pointed out by Mr. Garfield, not one evil mentioned by him, that the bill we now have under consideration will reach or remedy—not one. The evils he complains of all consist, in one form or another, of rebates and discriminations, open and secret, practiced under every kind of guise, in every sort of form that the ingenuity of railroad officials and shippers could suggest. Not one of them can you reach by this legislation, upon which we have spent three or four months of time. On the contrary, there is not one of them that you can not reach in fifteen minutes in a court of equity having competent jurisdiction under the Elkins law. There is no rate or discrimination pointed out by him that you can not reach.

It may be true, and doubtless is, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, that after the Elkins law was enacted it was discovered that rebates were being granted in Wisconsin. I do not know anything about the conditions there. But I do know that if the Elkins law had been enforced by the officials charged with the duty of enforcing it under the law there would not have continued any such condition of things, and there is no law on the statute book that now provides, and this bill if enacted will not provide, any remedy whatever against rebates. The House committee, in their report, said they did not undertake to deal with rebates and they did not undertake to deal with discriminations between shippers. They did not undertake to deal with anything except only excessive rates, the least troublesome and the least burdensome evil there is.

Mr. President, I have here a statement which I took out of a publication called "Freight." It comes to me through the mail, through the kindness of somebody who favored me with it, in which there is from week to week a discussion of this legislation that is proposed and of everything pertaining to the freight business throughout the country. On page 243 of the number I have before me, which is dated New York, May, 1906, I find a statement as to the proceedings under the Elkins law. It gives the number of decisions by the courts sustaining and enforcing that law, and there are quite a number of them, all of them important cases. There was the New Haven Coal case, one of the most important cases decided by the Supreme Court of late years. That was under the Elkins law. There was the Trans-Missouri Freight case, involving a question of discrimination between communities. That was under the Elkins law. There was the case of the packing houses as against the live-stock men—I have forgotten the style of the case—decided by Judge Bethea last January or February. That was under the Elkins law. There was the case a few days ago of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy road, where that corporation was fined heavily. That was under the Elkins law. There was the case of the Fairmont Coal Company in West Virginia, where the proceeding was by mandamus to compel equal treatment in furnishing cars. That was under the Elkins law. In every one of these cases there was relief instantly at the hands of the court upon application for a restraining order or a writ, which was finally made permanent.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Let me suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the very important case of Baer v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, which decided that the anthracite coal combination had to expose its books for examination, was under the Elkins law.

Mr. FORAKER. That was under the Elkins law.

Mr. KEAN. And the tobacco case.

Mr. FORAKER. And the tobacco case, as the Senator from New Jersey suggests, decided only recently. It was under the Elkins law. So it is that in every instance where the Elkins law has been invoked it has given instant relief, because in every one of these cases upon the filing of a bill a temporary restraining order or writ of mandamus or other order was allowed, which ultimately was made perpetual.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FORAKER. Allow me time enough to put in the RECORD this list of cases, and at another time I wish to point out and compare the cases decided by the Commission with those decided by the courts, when it will be found that the courts are far more expeditious.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The cases will be inserted in the RECORD, as requested by the Senator from Ohio, in the absence of objection.

The cases referred to are as follows:

PROCEEDINGS UNDER THE ELKINS LAW.

ST. PAUL, MINN., April 25, 1906.

EDITOR OF FREIGHT.

SIR: Can you advise me the proceedings which have been instituted under the Elkins law?

J. G. WEST.

The proceedings under the Elkins law are as follows: Fifteen injunctions to enjoin departures from published rates, twenty-one indictments for violation of the act, three indictments for conspiracy to violate the act.

The decisions of the courts upon this law are as follows: United States v. Mich. Cent. R. R. Co., 122 Fed., 544; W. Va. N. R. R. Co. v. United States, 134 Fed., 198; I. C. C. v. C. and O. R. R. Co., 128 Fed., 69, — U. S., —; Mo. Pac. R. R. Co. v. United States, 189 U. S., 274; United States v. A., T. and S. F. R. R. Co., — Fed., — (Judge Phillips).

United States v. Thomas & Taggart.
United States v. Crosby, Thomas & Taggart.
United States v. Swartzchild & Sulzberger Co.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this amendment, which is strictly intended to improve the Elkins law, as appears by its heading, I should like, with the permission of the Senator, to modify. On page 3 (page 143 of the pamphlet), on the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, which I think a very excellent one, I should like, in line 16, after the word "carrier," to insert the words "or shipper;" and in line 18, after the word "carrier," to insert the words "or shipper."

Mr. STONE. What page?

Mr. LODGE. Page 3 of the amendment; page 143 of the pamphlet.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the modifications.

Mr. LODGE. If there is no objection, I should like to have the modifications made.

Mr. DANIEL. While the Senator is on his feet I should like to ask him a question for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Virginia suspend until the Secretary reports the modifications.

Mr. LODGE. Of course I have a right to modify my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to modify it as he desires.

Mr. DANIEL. I observe some cross references here which would leave the mind in doubt as to exactly what we are doing. For instance, at the bottom of page 2 and the top of page 3 there is reference to other acts for the penalties we are inflicting.

Mr. LODGE. I can not hear the Senator; there is so much noise around me.

Mr. DANIEL. I will try to speak a little louder.

Mr. LODGE. It is not the Senator's fault. It is due to the noise all about.

Mr. DANIEL. At the bottom of page 2 and the top of page 3 there is a declaration of fines and penalties prescribed in section 10 of the act to regulate commerce as amended by the act of March 2, 1889. The point I suggest to the mind of the Senator is, had we not better set forth in this act what fines and penalties we are inflicting, for the reason that some of them seem to be too weak? And then we would have something to amend by the increase of imprisonment or the fine if we desired to do so. But in reenacting an old statute and putting it in with a new one, without a definition of its terms, the Senate are powerless either to know precisely what they are doing or to improve what they may be doing.

Mr. LODGE. The section is printed in the act to regulate commerce.

Mr. DANIEL. I have that before me.

Mr. LODGE. And the supplementary acts.

Mr. DANIEL. I have them before me at this time.

Mr. LODGE. It was to restore section 10. The penalties, as I have stated before, are in every case a term of imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both fine and imprisonment.

Mr. DANIEL. That is a very light penalty—merely two years—for some of these offenses. Some of them involve millions of dollars and the destruction of the business of other people, and a range ought to be given both as to fine and imprisonment, so that the tribunal that has a culprit before it might measure the penalty according to the nature and enormity of the offense. To put the chief offender who may be getting the benefit of millions of dollars by public roguery on the same basis with a minor employee, who may be under his direction, is to obscure or to nullify all distinction in offenders, and to bring down the great criminal to a level with the little one, and to prevent that distribution of justice which proportions penalty to the nature and extent of the offense.

I hardly know how to go at this bill in its present form to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts which would reach this matter.

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. If I may have the floor——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield further to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LODGE. My time is going so rapidly——

Mr. DANIEL. I hope it may be counted out of my time and not out of the Senator's. I dislike to intrude upon him.

Mr. LODGE. Not at all. I thought the Senator was going into his statement rather more largely than my time admitted.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. LODGE. I merely want to say one word in reply. If these penalties are not sufficient, it will be quite possible to amend them in the Senate. To my mind they seem entirely sufficient. The object of the imprisonment is simply to put in a penalty that will have an effect on those who are the offenders. I do not believe a money penalty is efficient with that class of offenders. I think a week's imprisonment is just as valuable as ten years as a deterrent with the people who commit the offense.

Mr. SCOTT. Who are the people?

Mr. LODGE. The law says the directors and managers of the corporation are to be imprisoned, and those in the employ of the corporation who make these contracts. The old law is very specific.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me that this reaches the point we want to reach, and if it is not enough it will be very easy to amend it in the Senate. But it seems to me it is enough, and that is just the distinction between my amendment and that of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to direct the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senate particularly, to the penalty clause of his amendment. The question in my mind is whether——

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not like to cut off the Senator from Missouri, but we ought to have some enforcement of the rule, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. In what way am I violating the rule?

Mr. ALDRICH. I thought you had spoken once.

Mr. STONE. Not upon the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. No, he has not. The Senator spoke on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. I do not think he has spoken on mine.

Mr. STONE. I have not.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator from Massachusetts has spoken at least three times.

Mr. LODGE. I have. I have undoubtedly violated the rule, as we all do.

Mr. STONE. There is a question of doubt as to whether the language of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts would in fact restore the imprisonment features of the act of 1887. The language of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is as follows:

Every person or corporation who shall offer, grant, or give or solicit, accept, or receive any such rebates, concession, or discrimination shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subject to the fines and penalties prescribed in section 10 of the "act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended by the act approved March 2, 1889.

Section 10 of the act of 1887 as amended by the act of March 2, 1889, contains this provision, and it is the imprisonment provision of the section. It is as follows:

Provided, That if the offense for which any person shall be convicted as aforesaid shall be an unlawful discrimination in rates, fares, or charges for the transportation of passengers or property, such person shall, in addition to the fine hereinbefore provided for, be liable to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not exceeding two years.

Mr. President, the thing to which I was trying, it seems in vain, to get the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts, but I will get the attention of some other Senators to it, concerns the Elkins Act. The Elkins Act of 1903 provides:

In all convictions occurring after the passage of this act for offenses under said acts to regulate commerce, whether committed before or after the passage of this act, or for offenses under this section, no penalty shall be imposed on the convicted party other than the fine prescribed by law, imprisonment wherever now prescribed as part of the penalty being hereby abolished.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will suspend until the Senate is in order.

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir; I will be glad to do so. [After a pause.] Is the Senate supposed to be in order now?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. The act of 1889 amending the act of 1887 did contain an imprisonment penalty. But the act of 1903 repealed it. The Senator from Massachusetts says——

Mr. LODGE. Excuse me. The Senator read the language. It abolished imprisonment. It did not repeal the act.

Mr. STONE. It did not in express terms repeal the act.

Mr. LODGE. That is why I had to reenact the whole law in a new form.

Mr. STONE. But the Senator does not reenact it.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I reenact the Elkins provisions——

Mr. STONE. Oh, yes.

Mr. LODGE. Changing them so as to restore the imprisonment penalty.

Mr. STONE. Yes; the Senator does repeat the first section of the Elkins Act, and adds that anyone who violates it shall be subject to the fine and penalties prescribed by section 10 of the act of 1887. The Elkins Act prescribes a certain fine, from one thousand to twenty thousand dollars, for doing the things which in his amendment the Senator from Massachusetts would have the law provide shall be followed by a fine and such penalties as are prescribed in the act of 1889.

Mr. LODGE. 1899.

Mr. STONE. No; 1889.

Mr. LODGE. I think 1899. It is the act of March, 1899, I think.

Mr. STONE. March 2, 1889; but that is not very important. The amendment of the act was of date March 2, 1889.

Mr. LODGE. Then my print is wrong.

Mr. STONE. Your print is wrong. It should be 1889.

Mr. LODGE. My print is wrong?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

If it be true as a matter of construction that the Elkins law, by the the provision "imprisonment wherever now prescribed as part of the penalty being hereby abolished," has the effect in legal intent of repealing the imprisonment clause of the act of 1889, then that part of the act of 1889 ceased to be operative; it was dead; it was no longer a part of section 10 of the act of 1889, and if it was not found in that section, if it was taken out by virtue of the Elkins law, then it can not be put back into the section except by a specific reenactment. If it is not restored by such enactment, then I submit whether the effect of this provision in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, that persons violating this act shall be subject to the penalties prescribed in section 10 of the act of 1887, would subject them to any penalty beyond that of a fine. I think that is exceedingly doubtful.

In drafting the amendment which I have prepared but have not yet submitted, but intend to present, I followed exactly the plan pursued by the Senator from Massachusetts. I took the first section of what is known as the "Elkins law," and provided for its reenactment except as to the penalties. I left the fine as it now appears in the Elkins law remain as it is, and I added this, and that is the only addition to it:

Provided, That any person, or any officer or director of any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, or the act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by any such corporation, who shall be convicted as aforesaid, shall in addition to the fine herein provided for be liable to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding two years, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

It seems to me that form would be preferable to the one used by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Where is that? Is it in the pamphlet print of amendments?

Mr. STONE. No; it does not appear in the pamphlet print. I will hand the Senator this copy of it, if he cares to look at it.

The only difference I see in a hasty comparison between that amendment and the one proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is that the Senator from Massachusetts seeks to restore the imprisonment penalty by providing that the persons convicted shall suffer the penalties prescribed by section 10 of the act of 1887, while in the amendment the Senator has in his hand the imprisonment penalty is specifically stated and set forth. I greatly fear that if the amendment is put in the form proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts we would be left without any imprisonment provision in the law.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me on an examination of the Senator's amendment, which I had not examined before, that it is identical with mine, except where I have put in the words "every person or corporation who shall offer, grant, or give or solicit," etc., shall be subject to the penalties of section 10 as amended the Senator has put in a proviso not referring at all to section 10, but specifically restoring the penalties.

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir; that is the difference, as I stated.

Mr. LODGE. I have not the slightest objection to accepting the Senator's form instead of mine. There can be no question about it, and it meets exactly the same point, and brings in the same penalty. I would much rather take it, if there can be any doubt about the form of mine.

Mr. STONE. I have had some doubt about the other amendment, and there can be none about this one.

Mr. LODGE. I suppose the Senator will have no objection, when I ask that it be substituted for mine, to my inserting the words "or shipper" after "carrier," which I inserted at the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX].

Mr. STONE. Oh, no; I have no objection.

Mr. LODGE. Then, in line 22, on the third page of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, after the words "common carrier," insert "or shipper," and at the beginning of line 25 insert "or shipper" after "carrier."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the modification made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The SECRETARY. The printed amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] is now substituted for that of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]; and on page 3 of the printed amendment, line 22, after the word "carrier," the last word in the line, insert the words "or shipper," and after the word "carrier," in lines 24 and 25, insert the words "or shipper."

Mr. LODGE. I offer the amendment of the Senator from Missouri in lieu of my own, and move its substitution for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA LOLLETTE].

Several SENATORS. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States," approved February 19, 1903, be amended so as to read as follows:

"That anything done or omitted to be done by a corporation common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof, which, if done or omitted to be done by any director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by such corporation, would constitute a misdemeanor under said acts or under this act, shall also be held to be a misdemeanor committed by such corporation, and upon conviction thereof it shall be subject to like penalties as are prescribed in said acts or by this act with reference to such persons, except as such penalties are herein changed. The willful failure upon the part of any carrier subject to said acts to file and publish the tariffs or rates and charges as required by said acts, or strictly to observe such tariffs until changed according to law, shall be a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof the corporation offending shall be subject to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000 for each offense; and it shall be unlawful for any person, persons, or corporation to offer, grant, or give, or to solicit, accept, or receive any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect to the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce by any common carrier subject to said act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereto whereby any such property shall by any device whatever be transported at a less rate than that named in the tariffs published and filed by such carrier, as is required by said act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereto, or whereby any other advantage is given or discrimination is practiced. Every person or corporation who shall offer, grant, or give, or solicit, accept, or receive any such rebates, concession, or discrimination shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000: Provided, That any person, or any officer or director of any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, or the act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by any such corporation, who shall be convicted as aforesaid, shall, in addition to the fine herein provided for, be liable to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not exceeding two years, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. Every violation of this section shall be prosecuted in any court of the United States having jurisdiction of crimes within the district in which such violation was committed, or through which the transportation may have been conducted; and whenever the offense is begun in one jurisdiction and completed in another it may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in either jurisdiction in the same manner as if the offense had been actually and wholly committed therein.

"In construing and enforcing the provisions of this section, the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any common carrier or shipper, acting within the scope of his employment, shall in every case be also deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such carrier or shipper as well as that of the person. Whenever any carrier files with the Interstate Commerce Commission or publishes a particular rate under the provisions of the act to regulate commerce or acts amendatory thereto, or participates in any rates so filed or published, that rate as against such carrier, its officers or agents, in any prosecution begun under this act shall be conclusively deemed to be the legal rate, and any departure from such rate, or any offer to depart therefrom, shall be deemed to be an offense under this section of this act."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If in order, Mr. President, I should like to say a word upon this amendment. I spoke on my own amendment. Have I a right to speak on the amendment to my amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin has a right to speak on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As I understand the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, it applies to all violations of the law. The amendment which I submitted applies only to cases of unjust discrimination or of false solicitation or of fraudulent representations by which unjust discrimination may be secured. Under the proposed substitute a friendly court might administer an entirely inadequate punishment. The trivial penalty of imprisonment for a day or an hour might be imposed. If a case should happen to be tried before an interested judge, who owned stocks or bonds in the railroad company whose officers or agents were arraigned, the punishment might be trivial and entirely inadequate. This danger is not merely assumed. I recall one case some years ago, brought under the interstate-commerce act, where seven or eight judges were found to be holders of stocks or bonds in the railroad companies interested in the case on trial.

In reply to the observation of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] touching the recommendations of the Interstate Commerce Commission, I assert that no report of the Interstate Commerce Commission can be cited where they have made a distinct recommendation that the penalty of imprisonment should be repealed, or where they approve the Elkins law in that respect.

The Senator from Ohio stated that in so far as he was advised the railroad companies had never recommended the repeal of the penalties of imprisonment. I, of course, am not able to say what has transpired in the committee having charge of this legislation further than is shown by the reports. I find, however, in one of the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission this language, which would seem to indicate that the railroad companies had been pretty insistent in urging the repeal of the penalty of imprisonment for violations of the interstate-commerce act. This is the language of the Commission in its report:

It is proper to call the attention of Congress to the special insistence of railroad managers and others that the imprisonment feature of the present law be repealed, and that punishment for all criminal misdemeanors under the act be limited to fine.

Now, after the interstate-commerce act——

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator kindly tell from which report he reads?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In 1895. I can not give the Senator the number of the report. I can give him the year. It was in the year 1895.

Mr. FORAKER. That was two years before the Maximum Rate case.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, that is true. Again the Commission said:

While the Commission must refuse to advise the abolition of imprisonment, its members are not inclined to oppose such legislation should Congress see fit to enact it.

That was the language the Senator was not able to quote exactly. I have it before me, and I will make it a part of the discussion.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator kindly give me the number of the volume?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can not give the number of the volume. I can give you the year the report was issued.

Mr. FORAKER. What is the year?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is 1895 also.

Now, examine the reports after the Elkins law had been enacted. In its analysis of the Elkins law the Commission in the report for 1903 reviews the changes with respect to penalties, but it is very careful not to commend it in that respect, although it does commend the law in other respects where it has commendable features.

Again, in its report for 1904, the Commission referred to the Elkins law, but makes no approval, directly or indirectly, of the repeal of the penalty of imprisonment, although it does commend the law generally.

I suggested, during the general debate here, that the Interstate Commerce Commission, shortly after the enactment of the Elkins law, did give expression of approval of that law. They were greatly rejoiced to get some legislation making amendments to the interstate-commerce act which they believed would strengthen it in other respects.

But in their latest report, the report for 1905, reference is made to the fact that they have previously given general approval of the Elkins law, and then say that—

Further experience, however, compels us to modify in some degree the hopeful expectations then entertained.

So, Mr. President, I maintain with confidence that there can be found in no report made by the Interstate Commerce Commission an approval of the repeal of the imprisonment penalty of the interstate-commerce act, and I assert that whenever opportunity is given to investigate the books of the railroad companies of this country it will be found that the repeal of the imprisonment features of the Elkins law induced the payment of rebates to a greater extent than ever before.

If Congress desires to insure respect for this law, it should provide a penalty of imprisonment for a term that shall make railroad managers and their employees charged with the conduct of railroad business stand in wholesome fear of the law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FORAKER. We are to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK]. I am advised that if he were present he would vote "nay," and I am therefore not at liberty to vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 49, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—49.

Aldrich	Burrows	Dryden	Hopkins
Alger	Carter	Elkins	Kean
Allee	Clapp	Flint	Kittredge
Ankeny	Clark, Mont.	Foraker	Knox
Beveridge	Crane	Frye	Lodge

NOT VOTING—13.

Allison	Depew	Mallory	Spooner
Burton	Gorman	Morgan
Carmack	Hale	Patterson
Clark, Wyo.	Heyburn	Proctor

So Mr. LODGE'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] as amended. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair the "ayes" have it.

Mr. BACON. I call for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin as amended.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McCREARY. I should like to have the amendment as amended read, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] asks that the amendment as amended may be read.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no!

Mr. McCREARY. I withdraw the call for the reading of the amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll having been called; the result was announced—yeas 73, nays 2, as follows:

YEAS—73.

Aldrich	Crane	Hemenway	Penrose
Alger	Culberson	Hopkins	Perkins
Allee	Cullom	Kean	Piles
Ankeny	Daniel	Kittredge	Rayner

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-night it be to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. ["No!" "No!"]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina moves that when the Senate adjourn to-night it be to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. McLAURIN. I move to amend the motion by making the hour of meeting 9 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. TILLMAN. I accept the amendment, Mr. President. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] to the motion of the Senator from South Carolina is accepted, I move to amend the motion of the Senator from South Carolina by making the hour of meeting 11 o'clock.

Mr. BAILEY. One amendment to the motion is pending.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have moved the amendment on the theory that the Senator from South Carolina accepted the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Did the Chair understand the Senator from South Carolina to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TILLMAN. I did.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then the amendment of the Senator from Illinois is in order. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina as amended.

The motion as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. Let the next section of the bill be read, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments to section 2? If not, the Secretary will proceed to read the next section.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer the amendment to section 2 which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just agreed to, at the end of section 2, it is proposed to insert the following:

That section 10 of said act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, be amended by adding thereto the following:

"Any person, corporation, or company who shall deliver property for interstate transportation to any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or for whom, as consignor or consignee, any such carrier shall transport property from one State, Territory, or district of the United States to any other State, Territory, or district of the United States or foreign country, who shall knowingly and willfully, by employee, agent, officer, or otherwise, directly or indirectly, by or through any means or device whatsoever, receive or accept from such common carrier any sum of money, or any other valuable consideration, as a rebate or offset against the regular charges for transportation of such property, as fixed by the schedules of rates provided for in this act, shall be deemed guilty of a fraud, which is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction within the district where such offense was committed, in addition to any other penalties provided by this act, be subjected to a fine equal to three times the sum of money so received or accepted, and three times the value of any other consideration so received or accepted, to be ascertained by the trial court; and in the trial for such offense all such rebates or other consideration so received or accepted for a period of six years prior to the commencement of the action may be considered, and the said fine shall be three times the total amount of money or three times the total value of such considerations so received or accepted, as the case may be: Provided, That the foregoing penalties shall not apply to rebates or considerations received prior to the passage and approval of this act."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it seems to me much more popular in this body to pass any character of drastic legislation aimed at a railway company for accepting a rebate and providing a severe punishment for anyone connected with the railway company from the highest down to the lowest officer for being a party in any way to the acceptance of rebates than it is to touch the great corporations and the great trusts of the country, which have held the railways by the throat and are enforcing such rebates upon them. We have been rather severe with the railway company, which is the victim, but we have been exceedingly careful so far in our legislation not to interfere with the great trusts of the country, which are the ones primarily responsible for practically all the rebates which have been granted.

We had a recommendation by the President of the United States in a message that was sent to us last Friday, in which he mentions but one of the great trusts of the country—the oil trust—and declares that they have benefited in rebates in a single year $750,00, or about three-quarters of a million dollars every year, and that wholly independent, Mr. President, of the extra amount they get out of the people of New England and other sections of the country, where they have the entire monopoly.

What does a fine of $5,000 amount to? Suppose you do get one conviction a year. You will then have imposed a penalty of $5,000 for taking $750,000. Suppose, on the other hand, you do convict possibly some one connected with the company for assisting or being a party to this rebate; suppose that you are able to reach one case out of a hundred, or one dollar out of a hundred, still in every hundred dollars the company would be ahead $99.

I seek by this amendment—it is clear, simple, and right to the point—to apply the only remedy which I believe will ever be a successful remedy against the trusts that compel these rebates. Why? If the Standard Oil Company, which for the last year has taken $750,000 in rebates or special privileges out of the railway companies of the United States, at the end of the year, in an action brought for that specific purpose, could be compelled to pay back two and a quarter million dollars, then I insist that you would have a remedy that they would remember; and if this plan be continued, and, under such an amendment as I have suggested, make it so that at the end of six years you can in a single action compel them to account for all of the rebates that they have taken during those six years—of course not antedating the date of the passage of the pending bill—then they will be constantly upon their guard, knowing continuously that, when one transaction has been completed and one great sum has been received by them, that is not the last of it; that when the year goes by it is not the last of it, but that for six years the Government can go back and compel them to pay back what they have received.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator if the Sherman anti-trust law and the Elkins law will not reach these corporations if they are guilty of these so-called "crimes?"

Mr. McCUMBER. They will not, and they have not in the past. I have no doubt that public opinion, which has been greatly aroused in the last year, will have a great deterrent effect upon the whole subject of rebates. I do not consider that this law which we will pass adds in this respect one atom of force or effect to the law as it exists to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think that the existing laws would be inadequate if they were properly enforced?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the existing laws, if properly enforced, are adequate as against the railway companies. I think the existing laws are inadequate as against the great corporations. If we have a supplemental act, such as I propose in this amendment, to make the great trusts pay back $3 for every dollar they get in rebates, taking that in connection with the punishment that is provided against the employees of the railway company, we shall then have a sufficient and effective remedy, because we shall have a remedy against both of them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just one other suggestion. The Senator called attention to the fact that the President has told the country that the "Standard Oil trust," so called, have robbed the people of $750,000 in the last year. Is it not proper to put in the RECORD the fact that that corporation have denied that they have been guilty of the crimes charged against them?

Mr. McCUMBER. If a corporation has not been guilty, it certainly will not be affected by this amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will read, Mr. President, the words of the President's message which was sent here last Friday. He says:

> The facts set forth in this report—

That is, Garfield's report—

> The facts set forth in this report are for the most part not disputed. It is only the inferences from them that are disputed, and even in this respect the dispute is practically limited to the question as to whether the transactions are or are not technically legal. The report shows that the Standard Oil Company has benefited enormously up almost to the present moment by secret rates, many of these secret rates being clearly unlawful. This benefit—

That is, the unlawful one—> amounts to at least three-quarters of a million a year. This three-quarters of a million represents the profit that the Standard Oil Company obtains at the expense of the railroads; but of course the ultimate result is that it obtains a much larger profit at the expense of the public.

Mr. President, in the annual message of the President of the United States on the 5th day of December, in speaking of this subject, he recommends specifically that at least twice the amount of all rebates should be recovered in a civil action. In the amendment which I have offered I go further, and place it at three times the amount, and in a criminal action, and this in addition to any little penalty that may be imposed upon the person upon whom the courts will be able to lay their hands.

Mr. President, it makes very little difference to these great trusts—the sugar trust, the oil trust, the steel trust, the meat trust, or any of these other trusts—that there is a law aimed at the individual, whom you will have to catch before you can prosecute, and, if the law applies, convict. It is almost impossible to secure the proper evidence for the conviction of that man. But under the proper law that we will pass now, which provides for a method of keeping the books of the companies, which shall be the same throughout the country, the items prescribed to a certain extent by the Interstate Commerce Commission, a method is supplied by which we can determine what money goes into the coffers of these great corporations—the trusts—from the railroad companies. It will be far less difficult to establish the fact that the Standard Oil Company or any other one of these great corporations has received in rebates three-quarters of a million dollars in a year than it will be to establish, in a criminal case, the time, the place, and the particular person who was instrumental in securing the rebates, because in that respect the evidence must be certain as to the time, the place, and the party, and the facts must be established on all three of those points beyond a reasonable doubt. It is much more difficult to convict an individual against whom an indictment is obtained under such a law than it is to prove that certain sums of money went out of the railway companies' hands and into the hands of the trusts, in addition to what was a legitimate or legal charge.

Mr. President, if we wish to stop rebates—and that is the gist of this whole case, because nine-tenths of our arguments upon the matter of this bill have been upon the question of rebates—if that is what we wish to get at, if we want to have an effective remedy, we will never have one that will be half so effective as one that will go directly to the company that solicits the rebate and obtains it, and compel it to pay it back three times over. It is no punishment to say to a corporation that receives a rebate, "You shall pay the sum back," because in that case it simply pays back what does not belong to it. It is no punishment to say, "You shall pay back only in those cases in which we can successfully conduct a criminal prosecution against an individual," because that may not amount to more than $5,000 in a single year. But it is something when you say that we can go back over any number of years and we can, in a single action, compel you to pay back all that you have taken during those years, and that three times over. If we want to eliminate rebates and eliminate them positively, it seems to me we can not do better than to adopt this amendment which goes to the root of these rebates.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator wish to interrupt me?

Mr. GALLINGER. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think that is all I desire to say, unless the Senator from New Hampshire wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the hysteria of this entire thing has been very clearly developed this afternoon. The interstate-commerce law imposed a penalty of imprisonment as well as a fine. The Interstate Commerce Commission, having in charge the administration of the law, appeared before the Interstate Commerce Committee and recommended that the imprisonment clause should be eliminated from the law, which was done; and from that time to the present the Interstate Commerce Commission, so far as I can learn, have never recommended the reenactment of that penalty in any law that has been before the Congress. But notwithstanding that the Senate has seen proper in its wisdom—I voted against it because I felt entirely justified in doing so—to reenact that provision of the law.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] proposes to inject into this railroad rate bill a provision aimed at the great trusts of the country. The argument made a little time ago was that a penalty of a fine did not deter railroad corporations from committing a crime. But the Senator, in dealing with the great trusts of this country, four or five of which could buy out all of the railroad corporations in the country, if they do not already own them, proposes simply to impose a fine. They are not to be subjected to the penalty of imprisonment, but they are to pay a fine.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is undoubtedly reading from the amendment as it was first introduced. The amendment which was read states "in addition to any other penalties provided by this act." So this is in addition to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. In addition to what?

Mr. FLINT. Where can we find the amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Let the Secretary read the amendment. I handed it to him. It is in addition to the present penalty.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is to be found in the printed list of amendments, at page 45, but there are some alterations.

Mr. GALLINGER. I accept the Senator's statement that he has some kind of a penalty in addition to a fine.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I wish the Secretary would read that portion, if the Senator from New Hampshire will allow it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will be pleased to allow it.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the printed amendment, line 7, after the word "committed," insert "in addition to any other penalties by this act."

Mr. GALLINGER. I confess that I do not know exactly what that means, but let it mean what it pleases. We are still face to face with the proposition that we are to have now, in this railroad rate bill, a provision dealing with the great trusts of the country. The Senator really believes, I apprehend, that it will be efficient for doing away entirely with the evil of rebates and discriminations which are already legislated against in the Elkins law. The crudity of this legislation and the dangers attending this kind of legislation have been shown fifty times during the last three days in the fact that Senators, offering amendments, have had them printed, and when they send them up to be acted upon they change them from one to five times; and the Senator from North Dakota, deliberating upon this great topic, as he doubtless did, because this amendment was not incubated in a moment, prepared this amendment which he had printed and which was before us and which we have all studied in an endeavor to learn its scope and meaning, and to-day he has found it necessary to modify it.

Mr. McCUMBER. When another amendment is put on a bill you often, in order to make your amendment in harmony, find it necessary to make changes. So when the Lodge amendment, which already provided for one character of punishment, was inserted, it was necessary to make the change, so as not to be in conflict with it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think that the penalty in the Lodge amendment will apply to offenses of the character involved in his amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. It will be in addition to that penalty. It does not affect that penalty at all. That penalty is simply by fine or imprisonment not to exceed two years, if they can convict an individual.

Mr. GALLINGER. Are the fines and penalties cumulative? Are those already imposed in the bill to be added up and this penalty or fine added?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have had sufficient experience in the prosecution of criminal actions to know that we are not liable to have a hundred cases to be tried, though we can prove, perhaps, that there have been a hundred different offenses committed. One trial is generally supposed to cover them all. It has never been customary to have one trial after another, although the offense may have been continuous and each day might be a separate offense. The Senator knows that to be the case, and therefore it was intended to make them pay back every dollar they got out of the company unlawfully and to pay it back three times over, so that it would be a punishment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad that some Senator has come to the relief of the railroads of the country. The Senator from North Dakota claims that this amendment is intended to protect them against crimes that are being committed by other corporations upon those railroad companies. This bill when it gets through the Senate will look like Joseph's coat, but in my great desire to have it acted upon I am not going to spend much time in discussing this or any other amendment. I believe I have not occupied more than fifteen minutes during the entire debate upon this great subject. But it does seem to me that if we are going to pass a bill regulating the railroads of the country and requiring them to give proper service, as they ought to give proper service, it is a mistake to inject all sorts of amendments relating to other subjects into that bill. For that reason I trust——

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator, while he is on his feet, if the subject of rebates is not pertinent to this bill, and that is all this amendment deals with?

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill as it came from the House of Representatives, with the indorsement of that great body and, we were told, with the indorsement of the President of the United States, and as it came to this body, with or without the indorsement of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, does not deal with that subject. I apprehend they thought that as the Elkins law as it stands to-day, or as it could easily be amended, dealt specifically with that question it was not necessary to enter into that in this legislation. That is all I care to say. I shall take pleasure in voting against this amendment, even though I should vote alone.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I listened with some attention to the remarks of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I do not find any of the trusts to which he referred named in the amendment, and I should be afraid that certain farmers in North Dakota, if they should happen to receive a lower rate of freight than some of their neighbors, might be in some danger of prosecution under the terms of this amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would ask the Senator in all candor if he would expect me to mention any special trust in the amendment?

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator made a speech saying the purpose of the amendment was to destroy certain trusts, and I thought he might apply some language——

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not so state, if I may correct the Senator. It is not to destroy the trusts; it is to prevent the trusts from extorting money from the railways.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is there not any way of exempting the farmers of North Dakota from what might be a very serious danger of injury to them from paying lower freight than some of their neighbors? It seems to me that this is rather drastic legislation in favor of the railroads.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not see how it is in favor of the railroads. It simply punishes somebody else who acts in conjunction with them and takes these rebates.

Mr. ALDRICH. It seems to me it is very drastic protection to the railroads, but I may be mistaken.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator thinks that is protection, they certainly ought to have that protection.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I am not concerned about protecting railroad companies against the payment of rebates. The rebate is absolutely indefensible, and if anything is settled it is settled that the practice must be discontinued. I do not think it is necessary at all to deal with it in connection with this bill, for the reason that the House of Representatives has at this session passed a bill, which is now before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate——

Mr. KEAN. I have a copy of it here.

Mr. SPOONER. Let me have it.

Mr. KEAN. It is a good bill.

Mr. SPOONER. The House of Representatives at this session has passed a bill which is before the Judiciary Committee, and which, I think, needs some amendment to make it more efficient, and which I believe will be reported by the committee. It is a bill "To authorize the recovery of the value of unlawful rebates and discriminations, penalty therefor, and for other purposes."

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator if the bill has been reported by his committee?

Mr. SPOONER. I think it will be reported at this session of Congress.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the bill is made a law, it will be practically the same as this.

Mr. SPOONER. I think it will be more carefully drawn and more elaborate and better adapted to meet the object which the Senator has in view. It provides for two classes of cases. In the first place, it forfeits to the Government all illegal payments. It provides for the recovery of the amount of the rebate in a class of cases where not willfully accepted, if there be such, and in the other class of cases, which would take all the cases referred to by the Senator from North Dakota, for the recovery, at the suit of the Government of double the amount of the rebate, or sum unlawfully received from the railway company. I do not doubt that the bill will be reported, nor do I doubt that it will meet the approval of this body, and its operation, I think, in connection with the provisions of the rate bill as to the keeping of railway accounts and the examination of railway books and all that will deprive the business men of this country of any great anxiety or inducement to seek rebates; and those who seek a rebate, knowing it to be in violation of the law, are as much deserving of punishment for violating the law as those who give it, and sometimes more so. So I think this subject may be dealt with at this session if the Senator's amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. McCUMBER. It may be dealt with, I will say to the Senator, and it may not. It is practically aimed at the same thing and so as to accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. SPOONER. The House treats the two classes separately, and I think we may as well.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I was going to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that it was my intention to offer this bill as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota. It is a bill I am very heartily in favor of, but since the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin I certainly will not do so, because the Committee on the Judiciary will probably report it at an early day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair, the "ayes" have it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLAY. I understood the Chair to announce that the "ayes" had it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Did the Chair announce it in favor of the "ayes?"

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then I withdraw the request for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the vote be taken again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The vote will again be taken. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. KEAN. Let us get down to section 4.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the next section be read.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have made my motion.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me that I may submit an amendment to the pending bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am appealed to to permit the next section to be read, and I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 14 of said act, as amended March 2, 1889, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. That whenever an investigation shall be made by said Commission, it shall be its duty to make a report in writing in respect thereto, which shall state the conclusions of the Commission, together with its decision, order, or requirement in the premises; and in case damages are awarded such report shall include the findings of fact on which the award is made.

"All reports of investigations made by the Commission shall be entered of record, and a copy thereof shall be furnished to the party who may have complained, and to any common carrier that may have been complained of.

"The Commission may provide for the publication of its reports and decisions in such form and manner as may be best adapted for public information and use, and such authorized publications shall be competent evidence of the reports and decisions of the Commission therein contained in all courts of the United States and of the several States without any further proof or authentication thereof. The Commission may also cause to be printed for early distribution its annual reports."

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the next section be read likewise.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; read the next section.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 4. That section 15 of said act be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 15. That the Commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates, or charges whatsoever, demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers, subject to the provisions of this act, for the transportation of persons or property as defined in the first section of this act, or that any regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting such rates, are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged; and what regulation or practice in respect to such transportation is just, fair, and reasonable to be thereafter followed; and to make an order that the carrier shall cease and desist from such violation, to the extent to which the Commission find the same to exist, and shall not thereafter publish, demand, or collect any rate or charge for such transportation in excess of the maximum rate or charge so prescribed, and shall conform to the regulation or practice so prescribed. Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction. Whenever the carrier or carriers, in obedience to such order of the Commission or otherwise, shall publish and file joint rates, fares, or charges, and fail to agree among themselves upon the apportionment or division thereof, the Commission may after hearing make a supplemental order prescribing the portion of such joint rate to be received by each carrier party thereto, which order shall take effect as a part of the original order.

"The Commission may also, after hearing on a complaint, establish through routes and joint rates as the maximum to be charged and prescribe the division of such rates as hereinbefore provided, and the terms and conditions under which such through routes shall be operated, when that may be necessary to give effect to any provision of this act, and the carriers complained of have refused or neglected to voluntarily establish such through routes and joint rates, provided no reasonable or satisfactory through route exists.

"If the owner of property transported under this act directly or indirectly renders any service connected with such transportation, or furnishes any instrumentality used therein, the charge and allowance therefor shall be no more than is just and reasonable, and the Commission may, after hearing on a complaint, determine what is a reasonable charge as the maximum to be paid by the carrier or carriers for the service so rendered or for the use of the instrumentality so furnished and fix the same by appropriate order, which order shall have the same force and effect and be enforced in like manner as the orders above provided for in this section.

"The foregoing enumeration of powers shall not exclude any power which the Commission would otherwise have in the making of an order under the provisions of this act."

Mr. GALLINGER. I renew my motion.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. I want to move a short amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it had better be done to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire declines to yield.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 11, 1906, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate May 10, 1906.

RECEIVERS OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Sargent S. Morton, of California, to be receiver of public moneys at Oakland, Cal. (temporarily removed from San Francisco by Executive order of April 28, 1906), for the unexpired part of his term of four years from February 4, 1903.

Joshua G. Wood, of Kansas, to be receiver of public moneys at Topeka, Kans.

Walker A. Henry, of Spokane, Wash., to be receiver of public moneys at Waterville, Wash.

Harry F. Nichols, of Ellensburg, Wash., to be receiver of public moneys at North Yakima, Wash.

REGISTERS OF THE LAND OFFICE.

J. J. Payne, of Des Moines, Iowa, to be register of the land office at Des Moines, Iowa.

William F. Haynes, of Coulee City, Wash., to be register of the land office at Waterville, Wash.

Truman G. Daniells, of Alameda, Cal., to be register of the land office at Oakland, Cal. (temporarily removed from San Francisco by Executive order of April 28, 1906).

POSTMASTERS.

OHIO.

George G. Sedgwick to be postmaster at Martins Ferry, in the county of Belmont and State of Ohio.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Alpheus B. Clark to be postmaster at Hastings, in the county of Cambria and State of Pennsylvania.

George H. Moore to be postmaster at Verona, in the county of Allegheny and State of Pennsylvania.

WISCONSIN.

Henry G. Kress to be postmaster at Manitowoc, in the county of Manitowoc and State of Wisconsin.

Frank S. Moore to be postmaster at Lake Geneva, in the county of Walworth and State of Wisconsin.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 10, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read, and, on motion of Mr. PAYNE, was approved.

PERSONAL REQUEST.

Mr. BINGHAM requested leave of absence, for ten days, on account of sickness.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the request be granted.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 112, noes 5.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-seven Members present; the ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CRUMPACKER in the chair.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a request. It has been my purpose to avail myself of an opportunity to submit some remarks on that part of the naval appropriation bill which provides for the building of a battle ship, but I know now that I will not be able to be present when that part of the bill is reached, and I ask the courtesy of the House to be allowed fifteen minutes to make some remarks on that clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that he may address the committee for fifteen minutes on the subject of the enlargement of the Navy. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, it has been my purpose to make only a few remarks on that part of this naval appropriation bill which authorizes the building under the direction of the President of the United States, through the Navy Department, of a battle ship of the largest size and the equal in all respects to any in the world, at a cost of not exceeding $6,000,000. A few minutes will suffice for me to say all I desire on the subject.

I have no naval experience or technical knowledge as to ships or their armament, though I have seen something of war. I recall that on February 20, 1885, more than twenty-one years ago, I took the floor in this House (Forty-eighth Congress) in opposition to a bill recommended by a naval construction board, by the Secretary of the Navy, and by a committee of this House—unanimously, I think—proposing to appropriate some millions of dollars to repair old wooden ships and to build or complete ships for our Navy on obsolete plans that had been adopted.

In the discussion of the bill much was then said by eloquent and patriotic statesmen as to what was requisite to the strength of our Navy in war. The achievements of John Paul Jones and other great sea captains in the Revolutionary period and in later periods in our country's glorious history were eloquently recalled; and it was loudly declaimed here that what was wanted was personal valor and heroic spirit to secure victory on the high seas. Lord Nelson's naval victories at Aboukir, Copenhagen, and Trafalgar were pictured as examples to be imitated; and much was said here about returning to the era of close fighting and the capture of ships by lashing them together and by boarding them. These heroic notions I then tried to dissipate, and succeeded so far that the proposed appropriation was never made. I demonstrated that there were even then a few ships in existence any one of which would have been able in a little time to annihilate the largest fleet Lord Nelson ever commanded—indeed, sufficient to have destroyed all the combined fleets that he had ever seen. Even some third and fourth rate powers then possessed each a ship equal to this—Italy the Lepanto and Brazil the Riachuelo.

It was also made clear then that the fourth-rate South American power, Chile, with her then one modern war ship, Esmeraldo, could have annihilated all the Navy of the United States proposed to be created under the then pending bill; and had it all been placed on the Pacific coast, the Esmeraldo could have triumphantly captured every port of the United States from San Diego to San Juan de Fuca. Brave spirits on obsolete ships are no guaranty of success. Nelson won Trafalgar, and a place in Westminster Abbey. He never commanded a ship that would have survived ten minutes in a combat with a modern war ship. The day of boarding a ship with marines carrying short arms and fighting on ship deck hand to hand disappeared more than fifty years ago and with the coming of steam power to propel a war vessel.

When, on April 4, 1862, the transport Carondelet steamed down the Mississippi past Island No. 10, Captain Hottenstein, with twenty-three men of the Forty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry, was ordered to protect the vessel from boarders. He put a boy in a protected place with a nozzle of a hose connected with the engine boiler in his hands, with instructions to squirt hot water on all who might attempt to board and capture the ship. [Laughter.] Neither numbers nor valor could cope with such a foe, and the idea of boarding to capture a modern steam vessel, let alone a war ship, vanished, and forever.

Since 1885 much progress in war ships, cruisers, torpedo boats, etc., in arms, armament, and armor, in speed and propelling power for ships has been made. We had a navy in 1898, though inferior to that of some other powers, yet able to win for our country victories which placed it first among the nations of the earth. But satisfactory and successful as our Navy proved to be in the Spanish-American war at Manila Bay (May 1, 1898) and Santiago (July 3, 1898), yet we have no reason to believe we then had a navy capable of coping with any real first-class naval power, and our Navy is certainly not now the equal to that of even a power like little Japan. We are now far down the list of countries in number and size of war vessels of all kinds and in their speed and strength.

Our recent naval successes against Spain should not lure us into a feeling of security. Our modern Navy has never fought a real naval engagement. Dewey in Manila Bay, with his long-range guns, easily reached and destroyed the Spanish ships there, he keeping well beyond range of the enemy's shots. He had time to deliberately haul off and cool his guns and make and cool coffee for the men of his fleet before finishing the battle. At Santiago conditions were different, but there was no real naval battle there. Our gallant officers and men did all there was to do and they did it well. They winged, sunk, or ran ashore the flying fleet of Cervera. There was no arraying of ship against ship or fleet against fleet. It is hard to say that a real naval engagement with modern war ships, cruisers, torpedo boats, etc., with the improved modern guns, has ever been fought. There was some appearance of it in a small way in the Japanese-Chinese war and in a war between Chile and Peru. There was some fighting of isolated ships at Port Arthur in the Japanese-Russian war, and in the same war, in the Straits of Korea, in Japanese waters, there was fought (May 27, 1905) a great naval engagement with modern ships and torpedo-boat destroyers, which, measured by results in destruction of ships, etc., never had an equal; yet, tested by all that goes to make a sanguinary sea battle, it is much like that of Santiago. Rojestvensky was there, too, seeking to evade rather than meet Togo and his fleet. The former was never prepared to meet an attack, and no part of his numerous fleet made anything like a combined one. He moved his fleet into a trap, and the several ships thereof in the main sought safety by attempting to sail away.

If the United States is to maintain her place among the great nations of the world, and remain immune from attack by sea, and protect her maritime commerce, she must have a first-class modern navy—first-class battle ships. She does not now possess them in comparison with other nations. The United States is not liable to attack by land forces by any foreign power if she possesses a good navy. She is water bound and water isolated. Her coast line is long, saying nothing of Alaska and her newly acquired island possessions. Including the principal lakes on the north, the Atlantic on the east, the Gulf of Mexico on the south, and the Pacific from San Diego to San Juan de Fuca on the West, the coast line is above 33,000 miles in length, not including inlets or deep bays. This coast line is one and one-third times greater than the circumference of the earth at the Equator.

Webster, speaking of the extent of the British Empire, said of its morning drum beat, that—

> It follows the sun in its course, keeps pace with the hours, and circles the earth with one continuous strain of martial music.

The same may now be said of the United States. The sun never ceases to shine on the flag of our Republic, unfurled and floating defiantly over our possessions. [Applause.]

With an adequate navy we can protect our island possessions as well as our natural coast and our commerce. Without such navy our exposed parts will be a temptation and invitation to other nations to attack, despoil, humiliate, degrade, and dishonor us. With such a navy our small standing army may still be maintained with safety, leaving to the volunteer citizen soldier to supply any deficiency in it should war come.

To maintain such a navy and army will insure that peace so much to be desired by all the friends of universal and eternal peace. The old maxim, "In peace prepare for war" was long ago obsolete. It was always barbaric. It was never sound in principle from a standpoint of true civilization. [Applause.] It was used in purely warlike times, when all the nations of Europe expected to be involved in war and before civilization was evolved out of barbarism, and when wars were waged for crowns for ducal heads and not for the rights and liberty of man. The maxim now should be, "In peace prepare to maintain it."

Our annals have been bloody. In the ninety years from Lexington (1775) to Appomattox (1865) we were, excluding Indian wars, engaged fifteen years in war, on an average one year out of every six.

In more recent years, when the civilized nations have generally maintained a continuous war footing, wars have been much less frequent. A third of a century of peace passed after the civil war, and then we volunteered to go to war purely for humanity's sake, without an international dispute. Much as the Christian and civilized people of the world desire and pray for peace—universal peace—our Republic can not alone remain unprotected.

I favor The Hague court or tribunal and welcome its continuance, and believe much may be accomplished by peace conferences. Much has already been attained in securing peace to the world. The fact that wars are much less frequent when the great nations are constantly prepared to wage it gives room for the creation of international courts to settle international disputes. The time will come, it is ardently to be hoped, when disarmament may begin by mutual consent, but that time has not yet arrived. The nations that unite in submitting their international disputes to arbitration or an international court must still be prepared to enforce its decrees—they must, like the decrees of all civil courts, have a physical power to enforce them, to give them potentiality. It is a mistaken notion to suppose that courts are independent of the executive branch of the State or Federal power. The courts' decrees would be a nullity for want of power to enforce them unless the constabulary, police, or military power could be invoked through the Executive, or otherwise, to execute them. Until the millennium comes, until all see eye to eye, physical power will be invoked to maintain order, prevent anarchy, and to maintain society and preserve organized liberty. I say this much though I believe much has been accomplished by recent efforts through The Hague tribunal and peace conferences toward securing peace among the civilized countries of the world. But let us, by a properly constructed and equipped Navy, stand with the greatest of the world powers, able to maintain our own integrity, uphold our own form of government and flag, and to guarantee, if possible, the peace of the world. [Loud applause.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of the bill we passed over without prejudice the paragraph relating to recruiting, on page 5 of the bill, and I would like to return to it. There was pending upon that paragraph an amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KELIHER], and I call for the reading of that amendment.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer a substitute for that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment he offered the other day, and offers the following as a substitute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, line 16, after the word "dollars," add: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended in recruiting seamen, ordinary seamen, or apprentice seamen, unless a certificate of birth or evidence other than his own statement satisfactory to the recruiting officer, showing the applicant to be of the age required by naval regulation, shall be presented with the application for enlistment."

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I will state that I took this matter up with the Department and with the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, and they wrote me their views in relation to it, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, D. C., May 10, 1906.

SIR: The Bureau firmly believes that the recruiting officers of the Navy strictly comply with the "Instructions for Recruiting Officers," which requires (p. 3, par. 823–1) that "he (the recruiting officer) shall, in order to guard against illegal enlistments, personally inspect and question those offering to enlist. He shall examine into their qualifications and determine their fitness and capacity."

Page 4, paragraph 2: "He shall carefully explain the regulations regarding enlistments, promotions, and discharge to those offering to enlist, explaining to them the kind of life they are to lead and that it will be mostly spent on board ship. He will use great care to see that no one under his command makes any promises or statements to applicants regarding advancement, instruction, or benefits in the Navy which can not be carried out after enlistment, and to have each applicant distinctly understand that discharge will not be granted prior to the expiration of enlistment."

2. The amendment proposed for insertion, on page 5, line 16, of H. R. bill 18750, is not at all necessary or for the best interests of the service, as all practicable means for preventing illegal enlistments are already being taken. In addition, the insertion of the amendment in question would require the accounting officers of the Treasury to make certain rules for the expenditure of the money appropriated, and such rules might seriously hamper recruiting.

3. The Bureau therefore trusts that the amendment will not be inserted.

Respectfully,

G. A. CONVERSE,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, D. C., May 9, 1906.

SIR: Referring to the discussion of the naval appropriation bill in the House yesterday, and especially to the amendment introduced by Mr. KELIHER, the Bureau desires to state that it would be impracticable in a great many cases to obtain a certificate of birth of an applicant for enlistment, or any more evidence of his age than is now required of him. The Bureau believes that all the recruiting officers use every possible means to ascertain the age of boys about whom there appears to be any doubt; that where the recruiting officer is not satisfied as to the correctness of the boy's statement, he directs him to call again in a few days, in the meantime endeavoring to verify the boy's statements, by correspondence if the applicant is from a distance, and by personal investigation if in the boy's home city. The Bureau's instructions to the recruiting officers are very explicit upon this point, and it believes the instructions are followed as nearly as possible. In spite of all precautions, however, it is impossible to prevent all cases of perjury.

Every applicant for enlistment is interviewed, first, by a petty officer of the recruiting station, who questions him closely, and explains to him carefully what will be expected of him if he enlists. If he passes this preliminary examination, the recruiting officer takes him in hand, explaining to him the seriousness of the oath he must take, the consequences of fraudulent enlistment, the term of enlistment, and the impossibility of obtaining a discharge before the expiration of the term, except for cause. The Bureau on its part uses every possible effort to prevent the enlistment of boys under age, and of boys over 18 whose parents object to their enlistment. To require the recruiting officer to obtain a certificate of birth or similar evidence in every case would hamper the recruiting service and interfere with the enlistment of many men to whose enlistment there can be no objection. It would not put a stop to perjury, for if parent's consent papers can be forged, as has been done, birth and other certificates will be. The Bureau begs to assure you that it is its constant effort to avoid other than absolutely legal enlistments, and an illegal enlistment only makes additional work and trouble for all concerned. The Bureau has yet to find a case of this sort in which the illegal act was not due to the anxiety of the applicant to enter the service; and has yet to find a case in which it has been established that the recruiting officer has not pointed out to the applicant the necessity of a correct statement of age, and the trouble that would follow taking a false oath.

Regarding the Executive order prohibiting discharges prior to expiration of enlistment, except for the causes mentioned, the Bureau states that this order has been in force for nearly four years, and its effects have been beneficial. Its provisions are fully explained to every recruit, and he enters the service fully realizing that he must complete his enlistment.

Respectfully,

W. P. POTTER,
Acting Chief of Bureau.

Hon. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RIXEY. May I interrupt the gentleman to say that I want to offer a substitute, and perhaps the gentleman would like to have it offered before he speaks.

Mr. McCALL. Very well.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute providing that no minor under 21 years of age shall be enlisted without the written consent of the parents or guardian.

Mr. KEIFER. Is not that the law now?

Mr. RIXEY. No; the law now is that the consent of the parents or guardian is required up to the age of 18, but it does not say written consent. And then there seems to be no law on the subject between 18 years of age and 21. The Bureau of Navigation has so construed the law that it has the right to enlist boys between 18 and 21 without the consent of the parent or guardian.

Mr. KEIFER. I was under the impression that it required the written consent.

Mr. RIXEY. No; it does not.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, what I wish to say is called out by letters to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which have just been read. The phraseology of these letters, it seems to me, is not exceedingly frank. They do not deal frankly with the real evil, which is permitting boys under 18 years of age to enlist. I had a case in my district where a boy residing in the city of Cambridge was enlisted by a recruiting officer before he had reached his fifteenth birthday. That fact was undeniable, and from that it would almost seem necessary to have a provision in the law that these recruiting officers should not enlist infants in arms.

Mr. FOSS. Let me say to the gentleman that when a boy comes to the recruiting office and asks to enlist in the Navy he has to make out this statement——

Mr. McCALL. Oh, I understand.

Mr. FOSS. His name and birthplace, and then, in addition to that, when he is under age, he has to have made out this oath of parent or guardian and sworn to before a proper officer.

Mr. McCALL. But when a boy is only 12 or 13 or 14 years of age he does not understand the importance of an oath, and I believe that our recruiting officers are not sufficiently careful in enlisting boys who may be under 18 years of age. When a boy of 14 does enlist, then there is a great ado about the papers that this infant has signed and the perjury that he has committed. Now, in this particular case, instead of discharging that boy immediately, as he should have been discharged, under the theory that he was not fitted for the service, they went to work and tried him for a fraudulent enlistment. The trial was before officers of the Navy, who were humane men. How they reached their verdict I can not understand, but they found that he was not guilty. So it must have been that they were very much affected or influenced by the tender age of the boy, and the result of it was that he was finally discharged because he was unfitted.

It is an undeniable fact that in the neighborhood of these recruiting stations, which in the city of Boston are in the vicinity of a great many saloons, you will see pictures representing the blue water and a beautiful ship and a sailor who looks almost superior to an admiral, pictures which appeal strongly to the imagination of a boy. A boy goes there and does not understand the legal documents, and I submit that the recruiting officers—I know of two or three instances of the sort—do not, as a matter of fact, exercise the care that they should exercise in dealing with young boys. I do not know whether the amendment of my colleague is in workable shape or not, but unless this abuse is reformed by the Navy Department it should be reformed by Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. McCALL. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts what right a naval officer now has under the law of the United States to enlist a boy under 21 years of age without the consent of his parents?

Mr. McCALL. I was not talking about the right of a naval officer to enlist a boy; but what they do is this: They produce these legal documents, which they ask the boy to sign, and in those documents the boy sets forth a case which, upon its face, justifies the officer in enlisting him. Then they have him swear to his age, and when it is found that the boy is under age—in the case of this boy I referred to, under 15—then he is accused of fraudulent enlistment, and his father has this alternative, either to permit his boy to remain in the Navy, although too young for it, or else run the risk of his being tried for fraudulent enlistment and sentenced to a term in prison and to have him dishonorably discharged from the Navy, which will forever disqualify him from serving his country.

Mr. BARTLETT. I wish to suggest to the gentleman that if there is no law now on the statute books which permits a boy to be enlisted under age, without the consent of his parents, then all enlistments under 21 years of age are illegal, and if the law now does permit enlistments under 21 years of age without the consent of parent or guardian it should be changed, and in that way these cases will be prevented. I have had several cases of this sort in my district, and I want to prevent anything more of the kind.

Mr. McCALL. Then the gentleman believes in the amendment offered by my colleague?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly I do.

Mr. McCALL. I am disposed to accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to correct a little misinformation in regard to this matter. I desire to call to the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] these facts: When a boy goes to the recruiting office to enlist he is obliged to answer these questions: Name, birthplace, date of birth, nativity, present residence of parents, height, weight, color, and then he is examined as to chest measurement, what sickness he has had and at what age, and is asked a number of other questions. Then, if he is under 18 years of age, his parent or his guardian must swear to this before a proper officer:

I, ———— ————, residing in ————, county of ————, State of ————, do hereby consent to the enlistment of ———— in the Navy of the United States as ———— to serve until ———— unless sooner discharged, subject to all the requirements and lawful commands of the officers who may from time to time be placed over him, and I do hereby relinquish all claim to his services and to any wages or compensation for the same, and I do hereby certify that he was born in ———— on the —— day of ————, 19—, and I, the said ————, do solemnly swear and affirm that I am the parent of said boy.

That is sworn to before an officer. Now, what better evidence could the recruiting officer have than that?

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. McCALL. That is in a case where the boy swears he is under 18 years of age, but suppose a boy of 14, as in this case, has made an affidavit that he is over 18 years of age, then where do you get the oath of the parent? I say that there are too many of those young minors enlisted and their oaths accepted as proof of the fact that they are over 18 years of age, when they simply want to break into the Navy, and that sufficient care is not used by recruiting officers in dealing with such young boys.

Mr. FOSS. Most of these cases, I think, which have been referred to on the floor have been where boys were very anxious to get into the Navy, and perjured themselves in order to get there.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois if it is not a fact that the case he has cited does not cover the cases that we are aiming to cure the abuse of at the present time. The gentleman is reading a certificate blank that is to be filled out by the parent of a boy who says he is under 18 years of age, who is an honest applicant, who has the consent of his parents. What we are going to get at is the case of a boy who says that he is over 18 years of age, when, in fact, he is about 15, or under, and who perjures himself by declaring he is over 18. That is the boy we are trying to get at, and he is not reached by the oath demanded in the certificate that the gentleman from Illinois reads. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I want to point out to the gentleman from Illinois the further fact that even in the case he mentions that oath required does not have to be taken before the recruiting officer, but may be taken before some one else. Therefore the recruiting officer has no means of knowing whether the persons who made the oath were actually the parents of the boy.

Mr. FOSS. That is true. The oath is taken before any officer who has the power to administer oaths.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state that I live in a city 18 miles from Newport, R. I., where there is a naval station, and there are a very large number of enlistments in the city where I reside. A great many young boys are enlisted. They become dissatisfied with something at home or something in the mill where they work and go to the naval recruiting officer, and he asks them their age. They are all posted as to what is required of them, and they state that they are over 18 years of age. Of course they commit perjury—we all know that; but they are enlisted. Their parents do not know where they are, and they get away from home and the first information the parent has is that he gets from receiving the boy's clothes from Norfork, Va., or somewhere else. He then finds that his boy has enlisted in the Navy, and yet that boy is under age. I have many, many letters from parents in regard to such matters, and I am met by the certificate of the Secretary of the Navy, approved by the President, under which no person can get out of the Navy unless the commanding officer consents or unless the boy has proved inefficient or is in ill health. If a provision were made like that which my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. KELIHER] has offered, providing for the birth certificate to be produced, it seems to me that that would cure the evil. I know the Navy Department states that the birth certificate is difficult to produce. I am positive, however, that it is not difficult to obtain a certificate of birth.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman to suggest that in some cases they probably could not procure the birth certificate?

Mr. GREENE. Well, in the cases where the birth certificate can not be secured, then the boy had better not be in the Navy. It can be procured from the city or town clerk, for every city or town clerk in the State of Massachusetts keeps a record of the births, and if the boy is a Catholic, it can easily be procured from the parish records.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GREENE. I want to say those certificates can be furnished no matter what the Navy Department states about it; they can be furnished.

Mr. FOSS. I yielded for a question only and——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOSS. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSS. I want to say just one word upon this subject. This amendment which is before the House requires that the recruiting officer shall demand a certificate of birth or some other evidence from the young man. As it is at the present time they require an oath from the parent or guardian before enlisting the young man in the Navy. In some cases those are forged undoubtedly. Young men are so desirous of getting into the Navy they get somebody to swear they are the parent or guardian and that is brought to the recruiting officer and the young man is enlisted in the Navy. That is undoubtedly done at the present time, but it seems to me all these matters ought not to be regulated here by Congress. We ought not to provide what evidence as to age the recruiting officer shall take. You might go into a whole lot of other questions as to nativity and as to many other things which the applicant has to answer in his application. Those are matters to-day of regulation by the Department.

Mr. WACHTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSS. Now, if those gentlemen who have grievances would go to the Department, or speak to me about them, I would be glad to have the regulation changed; but this is a matter purely of regulation. If you adopt this amendment introduced by Mr. KELIHER you may absolutely tie up this whole appropriation of recruiting because the Comptroller of the Treasury passes upon this. You say by this amendment no part of this sum shall be used unless satisfactory evidence is brought as to age of every applicant who comes to the recruiting officer to enlist, and what the Navy Department is fearful of is that you will absolutely make it impossible for them to recruit any men during the coming year and that the whole matter will become simply a legal question tied up here in the Comptroller's office. Now all these matters of regulation as to enlistment, as to what evidence shall be taken with reference to age and such question, ought to be a matter of regulation in the Department. Any grievances which are made here by Members of Congress which are just and reasonable will be remedied by the Department.

Now, that is where we ought to leave this matter, in my judgment. I think in the question of enlistment we often listen to stories and yarns told by the parents of a good many of these boys. Why, I know one day parents will come to us and wish to enlist boys in the Navy, and after the boys have been in the Navy a few weeks and do not find it as congenial a life as they expected they want to get out, and the same parents who a few weeks ago urged us to secure enlistment for their boys a few weeks afterwards come back and try to move heaven and earth to try to get those boys out of the Navy. Now, there must be some rule. If you are going to have a navy, you must have some rule in regard to enlistments and discharges, otherwise you will not have a navy. If you are going to leave it to the caprice and whim of the parents or the boy that he may go into the Navy whenever he wants and go out whenever he wants, what sort of a personnel are you going to have? Now, I want to say something has been said here on this floor with reference to this fraudulent poster, so called. I thought I would bring in one here this morning. Look at it for a moment. Is there anything so fraudulent about that poster? That is taken from actual life. This is the battle ship Connecticut, and the picture was taken of that ship and put here in this poster. Now, the picture of this boat down here and these sailors in it was taken down here at the Washington Navy-Yard. How would you paint the clothing on those sailors; any different color from blue? How would you paint the boat; any different color from the white it is? How would you paint the American flag in colors different from the red, white, and blue? I tell you that these statements which have been made here criticising the Bureau of Navigation and the recruiting officers of our Navy I do not believe are justified by the real facts. I do not see anything out of the way about that poster that would indicate or would justify gentlemen saying it was a fraudulent one and that the Navy is trying to impose upon the people and the boys of the country.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. PARKER. What does the gentleman say to that big capitalized statement on the poster, "Pay $16 to $70 a month?" It is good after they have been promoted to officers, but it is not good when they first go in.

Mr. FOSS. They have raised the pay up to $16 a month.

Mr. PARKER. How does it get to $70 a month except when they have been promoted after long service?

Mr. FOSS. They go on up to $70.

Mr. PARKER. How soon?

Mr. FOSS. Not only that, but when they come to the recruiting office they get these pamphlets, which they can read through, and which are entitled "Advice and Instruction for Recruits."

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FOSS. Here is another poster.

Mr. COCKRAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if the poster that he has been exhibiting fairly represents to the mind of an applicant for enlistment the whole routine of his duty in the Navy?

Mr. FOSS. Oh, no, no.

Mr. COCKRAN. Now, I will ask the gentleman if there can be a more effective method of misrepresentation than what is known as the suppressio veri?

Mr. FOSS. I will let the gentleman answer that himself.

Mr. COCKRAN. There is only one answer.

Mr. FOSS. You can not put into a picture like that all of the duties——

Mr. COCKRAN. But I asked the gentleman——

Mr. FOSS (continuing). Which the men in the Navy will be called upon to perform. But in addition to this there are pamphlets entitled "Advice and Instructions for Recruits in the United States Navy." There is plenty of information given to them if they will only read it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. That is not the only poster.

Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS. Could you not have an album of several hundred pages, with moving pictures in it?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if that poster is not the result of a number of designs advertised for by the Navy Department, sent out through the Post-Office Department, and luring young boys into the Navy, and whether the prize was not made to the firm that submitted it and had it printed?

Mr. FOSS. I did not hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. McNARY. I will ask it again. I would like to know whether or not that poster is not the prize design poster submitted by a firm in Washington as a result of the request of the Navy Department for bids and for designs, and that that poster, submitted with a number of others, was agreed upon as being the most attractive, possibly, and alluring, to induce young boys to enter the Navy? Whether or not that particular poster is not a prize poster paid for by the Department?

Mr. FOSS. I do not know whether that is a fact or not. This is the first time I have heard of it.

Mr. McNARY. It is so stated to me, and the concern that won the prize is a Washington concern, located down near the corner of Fifteenth street and Pennsylvania avenue, or thereabouts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. Foss] may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Now, will my colleague yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. FOSS. I do.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask my colleague whether he thinks it is essential to the Navy, in order to obtain men for it, that it shall imitate the circus country poster, which is issued in flaming colors to get boys inside the circus? Is it necessary for the United States Government to imitate Barnum and Bailey to secure men to run the Navy?

Mr. FOSS. No; I do not think it is necessary, nor do I think that these advertisements are of that character.

Mr. MANN. Certainly that which the gentleman produces is an imitation of a circus poster.

Mr. SULZER. Worse than a circus poster. It says, "What a splendid opportunity to see the glories of the Orient!" [Great laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am heartily in accord with the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the Navy of the United States, in their effort to secure good sailors for the Navy. Now, for information for myself, and I think the House wants similar information, I would like to have the gentleman exhibit the other poster that he held underneath the one with the picture of the ship on.

Mr. FOSS exhibited the poster.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I notice it says in large type, "Great opportunity for advancement."

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Now, I am unaware of the opportunities for advancement of the common sailor in the Navy. For the benefit of the House, and information purely, I would like to ask the gentleman if he has sufficient knowledge to inform the House what the "great opportunities for advancement" are in the Navy as regards the common sailor, other than age?

Mr. FOSS. Well, a boy may enter the Navy, and if he proves himself to be a good man, he can go up through the different grades of petty officers and go up into the commissioned grade of the Navy.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. How long does that take him? Has the gentleman any record to show?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. What boy has been able to get to be an Admiral of the Navy?

Mr. MANN. How many enlisted men have become commissioned officers in the Navy?

Mr. KEIFER. Farragut and others came up from service on the deck.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am very much obliged for the information, and it is surely information to me; I never heard very much of it before. But does the gentleman think that the young men really appreciate what is the meaning of that "great opportunity for advancement" he has? And if so, I think the country and the House ought to know it.

Mr. FOSS. Well, it depends entirely upon the boy. I do not presume a boy of 17 or 18 years of age fully understands the opportunities or appreciates the position.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is just what I wanted to know, and I thank the gentleman for it.

Mr. FOSS. It all depends upon the boy.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Why do you put in your advertisement,

"Good opportunity for advancement," when there are very few cases indeed in which advancement is open to the men; and that that is true is proven by the records of the Department.

Mr. FOSS. Every man has a fair chance.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. How many have been advanced from the position of an enlisted man to a commissioned officer of high rank within the last, say, ten years?

Mr. MANN. Or a commissioned officer at all?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Or a commissioned officer at all, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOSS. A number of them have.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. How many?

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. SULZER. Mention one.

Mr. FOSS. I do not know their names, but they can be furnished.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. How many in all?

Mr. FOSS. I can not give the exact number.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. LACEY. I want to suggest to my friend, the chairman of the committee, that in view of the various suggestions made on the floor here——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The committee will be in order, and all gentlemen will be seated.

Mr. FOSS. I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LACEY. I would suggest to my friend from Illinois that he ask the Navy Department to amend these handbills and put on them, "Who enters here leaves hope behind," in order to encourage enlistment. That seems to be the thought of a great many gentlemen here.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] exhibited a postal here——

Mr. FOSS. I want to answer the gentleman's question. The number allowed, I am informed, each year is twelve of the deserving young fellows who can go into the commissioned ranks.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I am speaking of the number that are actually advanced.

Mr. FOSS. I do not know how many have been advanced, but I think probably the full number each year.

Mr. ROBERTS. Oh, no.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. By no means.

Mr. FOSS. Or very nearly the full number.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. By no means. But I wish to ask you one other question. You exhibited to this House a poster.

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is that the only poster you are aware of that has been put out to lure young men into the Navy?

Mr. FOSS. There is a larger poster.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I should say so.

Mr. FOSS. And here is a photograph of it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is not that a very large poster, about the size——

Mr. FOSS. It is about 10 feet long and 6 or 7 feet wide.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. About the same size that the theaters and circuses use, as was suggested here.

Mr. FOSS. It says: "Young men wanted for the Navy, ages 17 to 35. Communicate with the recruiting office."

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. And a picture of a large battle ship.

Mr. FOSS. Yes; the Connecticut.

Mr. SULZER. And oriental trees in the distance.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Palms and beautiful foliage in the distance. Are not those very large posters that you have just mentioned displayed in all the cities in the United States, on the dead walls of the city?

Mr. FOSS. They are displayed. On what kind of walls they are displayed I do not know.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Well, they are displayed on the fences and dead walls of the cities. Is not that true?

Mr. FOSS. I think that is probably true.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does the gentleman from Illinois believe that is the proper way of advertising the United States Navy with dignity and of attracting worthy young men to go into the service? I should like a frank and fair answer from the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOSS. What would the gentleman from New York do?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I would not attempt any such claptrap advertisements in order to attract men into the Navy.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, the House has heard the statement submitted by the naval officials to the effect that great care is exercised in recruiting these boys. Nevertheless, if a recital of the complaints known to Members of this House should be called for at this time, the afternoon would be taken up in listening to harrowing tales that have come to the personal attention of almost every Member. The recruiting officers must plead guilty to one of two things—either they are lamentably lacking in judgment, or they willfully ignore the spirit and letter of the enlistment law. If the Navy wants these young boys, let it say so, and let it be done strictly by regulation and in accordance with law.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. How would you get them?

Mr. KELIHER. If the gentleman will be patient for five minutes I will endeavor to tell him.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Will you allow me just to say to you that we are some seven or eight thousand short now of making up our quota, that the ships have not men enough to man them, and even with all these alluring advertisements we are unable to get enlistments enough.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman want these boys in the Navy who are under age?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I think a boy, if he intends to follow a seafaring life, is old enough when he is 17 or 18 years of age to go into the Navy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] says, why make a restriction in the law that you do not follow?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I should like to know how you are going to get men for the Navy?

A MEMBER. Pay them better.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. It has been impossible to get them this past year or two. We are seven thousand short of our quota.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does the gentleman think that a boy 17 years of age, whose mother is insane and whose father is dead, should be kept in the Navy when his services are imperatively demanded at home?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. No; I do not.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, I am not complaining about the age fixed by the Department in the regulations at which they take the boys, but we are aiming to keep out the boy who falsely declares himself to be of an age beyond that which is his own age. That is the boy we are trying to keep out. The age is fixed by statute, and the regulations are based upon this statute. The statute gives the Secretary of the Navy the right to take boys from 15 to 18, and to show that the Department itself did not want these boys it, of its own accord, of its own volition, raised the age from 15 to 17; so that the boy to-day can not enlist unless he perjures himself if he has not reached the age of 18.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. KELIHER. Yes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is it not a fact that when a boy does enlist under the lawful age and seeks to be discharged through his parents, the officers of the Navy threaten that they will court-martial this young infant if he dares to assert that he is under age?

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, that sad fact has been impressed on the minds of every Member of this House fully. I shall take no more time to emphasize it. But, Mr. Chairman, the point I make is this: The gentleman from Illinois holds in his hand a blank certificate of enlistment pointing out that a boy who declares that he is under 18 years of age has to obtain the consent of his father and mother, and that the statement has to be made under oath. Yes; the honest boy is compelled to bring a statement of his parents sworn to, but the perjurer, the youthful perjurer, with no conception of the enormity of his crime, boldly walks in and declares that he is over 18 years of age, and is accepted without a line or word of evidence other than his falsely uttered statement. My amendment simply makes it necessary for the young evil doer to procure a certificate of his birth or present other written evidence to the effect that he is over 18.

We hear a great deal said in this House that that is impossible. The boys who are enlisting to-day, Mr. Chairman, are around 15, 16, 17 years of age, and in many instances under 21. Now, within the last twenty years our nation has made great progress, and there is scarcely a city, town, or hamlet in this country where provisions have not been made for the registration of births. We are not in war times. It is not necessary to hastily press these boys into service. We might say to them, "Wait a week and write home," even if they belong in Kansas or California; "Write and get your birth certificate." My amendment is drawn with sufficient latitude to do away with that when it proves impossible or impracticable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusets has expired.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment obtains the recruiting officer says to the boy, "How old are you?" He says, "I am 19 years of age." The recruiting officer says, "I want a certificate of your birth." The boy says, "I can't get it." Then the officer, when he finds this to be so, says, "Get some evidence. Where did you work last? Get the evidence from the man you worked for. Get me some satisfactory evidence of any sort."

Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I offer this amendment simply and solely for the purpose of having something—when we find a boy of 14 or 15 enlisting as 18 or over—something in the hands of the recruiting officer to show us upon what evidence he took the boy in. If the recruiting officers had two eyes they would not have accepted these striplings in the Navy to-day. It is simply to bind the recruiting officer to the proper performance of his duty that this amendment is offered to the regulations under which he now recruits.

They tell us that the Treasury Department will hold up the recruiting of the Navy. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee how many times the Comptroller of the Treasury in the auditing of Navy accounts relative to the payment of money for enlisted men has paid any attention to whether enlistment laws or regulations have been strictly observed? I venture to say that he knows of no case whatever. The only trouble with the amendment is that the naval department is unnecessarily sensitive; it believes that we are reflecting on the character of the recruiting officers. I say nothing of their character, but I would that they had used better judgment in the past, and there would have been less of this trouble.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said before, the subject of recruiting is established by statute law, and I do not aim to change any statute, but simply to change the regulation in a slight way. I want by my amendment to have the law and regulations properly amended, and so that it will work no hardship to anyone. The duty of getting evidence required does not devolve upon the recruiting officer. It devolves upon the applicant. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that the Navy Department itself raised the minimum age from 15 to 17. I speak to-day, Mr. Chairman, in no spirit of hostility to the Navy Department or its officials.

I speak for the mothers of the land who lose their boys, rattle-brained young fellows with no conception whatsoever of the seriousness of the crime of perjury. After they have been enlisted they complain to their mothers and the mothers appeal to the Congressmen, but under the ironclad order issued by the President it is impossible to get these boys out without a court-martial. It is to obviate that form of trouble and complaint that this amendment is offered. I reiterate that if it were not for the sensitiveness of the officers in the Navy Department there would not be one syllable of opposition offered to my amendment, which I trust the good sense and sympathy of the House will adopt.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CURTIS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 134. Joint resolution authorizing the construction and maintenance of wharves, piers, and other structures in Lake Michigan adjoining certain lands in Lake County, Ind.;

H. R. 15095. An act authorizing the condemnation of lands or easements needed in connection with works of river and harbor improvement at the expense of persons, companies, or corporations; and

H. R. 18204. An act to authorize the Northampton and Halifax Bridge Company to construct a bridge across Roanoke River at or near Weldon, N. C.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5989. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River in Broadwater and Gallatin counties, Mont.; and

S. R. 54. Joint resolution authorizing a change in the weighing of the mails in the fourth section.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WACHTER. Mr. Chairman, I call for the reading of the amendment.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up all the afternoon in discussing this matter. I therefore move that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to close all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto in fifteen minutes.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks for the reading of the amendment. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection; and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I think in the matter of recruiting we ought to be just to the Government, to the parent and guardian, and to the boy. If the Government acts fairly in the matter of enlistment no harm will be done. It is entirely right and proper for the Government to advertise in a proper way the fact that it needs sailors, and to state what are the advantages to the enlisted men. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KELIHER] is objectionable and will lower the protection rather than increase the safeguards. His amendment provides that the enlisting officer shall have the certificate of birth or other satisfactory evidence. If, therefore, the officer who enlists is called on to explain why he enlisted a minor he can readily say, "Why, the evidence furnished to me was satisfactory." The evidence might not be satisfactory to anybody else; it does not require the consent of the parent or guardian. His rights are entitled to protection.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does not the amendment say written evidence?

Mr. RIXEY. No; it does not.

Mr. WACHTER. Does not the gentleman believe that that would be a method of bringing it to the notice of the parent or guardian?

Mr. RIXEY. Not necessarily. The officer might say that the affidavit of the boy was sufficient evidence. Certainly it ought not to be left in that way. The present statute provides that where the boy is under 18 years of age the officer shall not enlist him without the consent of his parent or guardian, and I certainly would not alter that law. All that I would do would be to enlarge the scope of it and provide that no boy under 21 years of age should be enlisted without the written consent of his parent or guardian. When you provide that it seems to me it is as far as we can go in justice to all the parties, and the amendment which I offer carries out this idea and requires the enlisting officer to have the consent of the parent or guardian. If the parent or guardian gives written consent and the boy is willing, why should anybody else object? The Government wants the seamen and if the parent is willing and the boy is willing, it seems to me he ought to be allowed to enlist.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Is there not a law now which makes it incumbent upon the officers to discharge these boys when they are found to be under age?

Mr. RIXEY. No; I think not.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Would it not be a good idea to incorporate something of that nature in the amendment?

Mr. RIXEY. If a boy is enlisted without the consent of his parent or guardian where that is required, then as a matter of law the parent or guardian has a right to have the boy discharged.

Mr. WACHTER. But suppose the boy swears that he is 21, and he is not 21?

Mr. RIXEY. If the boy swears that he is 21 when he is not, but appears to be 21, and the officer knows nothing to the contrary, and he is enlisted, then the only thing that can be done is to prosecute the wrongdoer, just as the gentleman would have to do if his name was forged. If the boy is accountable, he can be held responsible for false swearing.

Mr. WACHTER. Then that brings the situation back to where it is now.

Mr. RIXEY. I say that, so far as that is concerned, you can not relieve a man who is of responsible age from responsibility for his acts. I would protect the rights of the parent or guardian, and in doing that it would protect the boy himself.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Would the written consent of his parent or guardian add to that, if any exists? A boy who is an orphan and has no estate would have no parent or guardian.

Mr. RIXEY. Then, does not the gentleman think in that case the boy ought to have the protection of the court, and that the court ought to appoint somebody as guardian to act for him?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Chairman, I listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss], and he advises Members of this body to go to the Navy Department, and there they will consider the complaints that are made. I have been to the Navy Department many times and have frequently written them, and I have received in reply a little slip of paper on which is a statement from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy giving the conditions under which the man can be discharged from the Navy, and that is accompanied by the order of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy forces of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt, under which the Navy Department can shield itself from any responsibility. The instructions to the enlisting officer provide that he shall not knowingly enlist any boy under age. The amendment presented by my colleague is not unreasonable, and it ought to be adopted.

The printed slip, to which I have referred, provides that the recruit can not be discharged except upon complaint to his commanding officer or unless he has proved inefficient or unfit for the service. Therefore the boy having been enlisted in the service by reason of the fact that he has made a false statement, there is no method by which he can be discharged except to submit to punishment for perjury and a dishonorable discharge from the Navy. The amendment offered by my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. KELLIHER] I claim cures that evil. The gentleman from Illinois says that it will stop enlistments. If it stops enlistments, it is far better for the Navy to stop them, and my idea would be for the Navy Department to make other provisions for securing enlistments rather than to induce young boys to commit perjury in order that they may enlist in the United States Navy. There are complaints about desertions in the United States Navy. The desertions arise largely from the young boys who get into the Navy and are unfit for the service and ought not to be there, and in regard to the difficulty in furnishing birth certificates, my idea would be, if birth certificates can not be furnished, then it would be better that the naval officer should not obtain the recruits.

Mr. BATES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Mr. BATES. Is the gentleman aware, in connection with what he is just stating, how many enlistments there were during the year 1905?

Mr. GREENE. No; I am not aware of the number.

Mr. BATES. Let me read the figures, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. GREENE. If you do not take too long; make it short.

Mr. BATES. There were 41,000 applications, and out of 41,000 applications there were 28,000 rejected and only 11,000 passed that were finally admitted.

Mr. GREENE. That makes no difference. What I state would be true if there were only 1,000 accepted. I do not say they do not reject men that ought to be rejected or do not reject boys that ought to be rejected, but they do accept boys that they ought not to accept, and it is not to the credit of the United States Navy that they accept these boys; it is not to the advantage of the United States Navy that they enlist them, and it is, in my judgment, far better to keep them out.

Mr. BATES. This only shows the charge which has been made on the floor of the House, that they take in everyone who applies, is not borne out by the facts.

Mr. GREENE. Whatever may have been said by anyone else I am not responsible for. I simply state they do accept boys who ought not to be accepted in the Navy, and if the boy of a Member of Congress should happen to be enlisted he would not stand it for a moment, but the present system hits the poor boy, the boys of the men who can not afford to take out a writ of habeas corpus to withdraw their sons from the Navy, and they have no means of redress, but are obliged to submit to these regulations which are wrong and ought not to be perpetuated, and I hope that the amendment presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts will prevail, or some amendment will be adopted that will cure the evil which I know exists. And I know that the desertions occur in the Navy and will occur as long as this method continues, and if it is necessary to raise the age or raise the pay it would be better that the Congress should raise the pay. This Government has money enough to increase the compensation rather than to undertake to build a navy up with boys entirely unfit for the service, who are wrung from their families in a way that should not be longer continued.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether any amendment providing formalities will do any good. In my experience I have not found that formalities ever do anything but protect carelessness. The difficulty about this whole business of enlistments seems to lie in the care that is taken to see that only the right people are enlisted. My own town consists of about 300,000 people, and it is a large recruiting station, and we have an object lesson before us. There is a little Army recruiting station in that city during the year, where they have time and the opportunity to look into each case, see the parents and get their consents, and there is seldom, if ever, a complaint from the Army recruiting station on the subject of enlistments. But once every year for about a week or two weeks the town is posted with placards describing the benfits of going into the Navy, and a year ago in a week seven cases came to my attention which I could not bring before the attention of the Navy Department, because in about every one of those cases boys who were 16, 17, and 18 had sworn that they were 21 years of age, and to go to the Navy Department was to tell that Department that they had committed perjury, and to put them under the ball and chain.

Now, I do not care about those consequences compared to the act, for the horrible thing is the act of committing perjury, and that it should be encouraged by carelessness in this regard. It is only a few months ago that an Army case came before our committee. A soldier had been promoted to be an officer. His age as reported on promotion was a good deal younger than the age to which he had sworn when he entered the Army, and it was held that a man who had sworn falsely could not be promoted to be an officer. The disgrace is upon the man for life. But the disgrace is likewise upon the Department and the officers if they are careless in enlistments and try to get boys into the Navy without carrying out the regulations and without being careful to bring it before them that it is of importance whether their affidavits are strictly true.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if the time has all been consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. There are two minutes remaining. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am surprised that any objection should be interposed on the part of anyone to the adoption of an amendment which will prevent receiving into the Navy young men who commit perjury, or which will undertake to correct the conditions which permit them to go in with even their parents deceived as to the conditions they are to encounter when they get in.

I do not believe, sir, that 17 or 18 years of age is too young to admit boys to the Navy, but it certainly ought to be done under frank and honest conditions. Frank and honest conditions require that the truth shall be told about their age, and the officers who recruit these young men should be compelled by law to ascertain absolutely what is the age of the boys when they come into the Navy. It has happened, sir, no doubt to every Member of this House, that Representatives have had their attention drawn to the fact that young men have been induced to go into the Navy, sometimes, I admit, because they have been self-deceived, with the idea that they will be able, by enlisting at a tender age and by the study of the profession of seamanship, to arrive at a commission. Now, frankly, sir, it is almost impossible for them to realize that ambition. When we passed the personnel act we provided a very small opening through which young men from the humbler ranks of life, young men without the advantage of graduation from the Naval Academy, might get into the Navy. But, sir, so far as I am advised, so far as this Naval Register discloses to a casual examination, only two young men have ever had the privilege of reaching the grade of junior lieutenant without graduation from the Naval Academy.

Mr. Chairman, the laws have made of the Navy an un-American institution. It is not inviting to the young men of the country, but it ought to be made so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSS. Upon our side of the House there is a gentleman who was formerly in the Navy, and I am going to ask that three minutes be given to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. KELIHER. Regular order, Mr. Chairman!

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from Illinois will give three minutes over here, we will agree.

Mr. FOSS. Yes. I move that we extend the debate six minutes, which will give three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and three minutes to the other gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KELIHER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended for six minutes, three minutes of which are to be given to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and three minutes to the other gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KELIHER]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I particularly want to refer to questions which were asked the chairman of the Naval Committee relative to that statement which is made on the enlistment posters that men receive from $16 to $70 a month and that there is further opportunity for promotion.

Men in the Navy do receive from $16 to $70 a month. At least 5 per cent of the men before the mast are petty officers, who receive when at sea from $40 to $70 a month. In addition to that, there is a grade of officers in the Navy known as warrant officers. Those men are promoted from the men shipped before the mast. There are in the Navy 47 chief boatswains, 93 boatswains, 45 chief gunners, 70 gunners, 39 chief carpenters, 56 carpenters, 6 sailmakers, 201 warrant machinists, and 36 mates. And I believe it is a fact that every one of these men were shipped before the mast and have since received their promotion.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How many have become commissioned officers in the Navy?

Mr. WEEKS. I am coming to that. The pay of these warrant officers, 596 of them, ranges from $1,300 to $1,800 a year, and every one of them, I believe, enlisted before the mast. In addition to that, under the present law, a law passed in 1901, the President is authorized to appoint from these warrant officers five officers a year to the grade of ensign in the Navy provided they can pass the required examination. That answers the question specifically, it seems to me.

Mr. MANN. How many has he appointed?

Mr. FOSS. About twenty.

Mr. MANN. And what is the reason that they have not been appointed every year?

Mr. WEEKS. Why not?

Mr. MANN. Because the Navy Department turns them down.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Because they can not pass the examination.

Mr. MANN. Because they will not permit them to take the examination. How many have been appointed?

Mr. WEEKS. That I do not know.

Mr. MANN. You can not give us that information.

Mr. WEEKS. The fact is these men can be examined, five each year, and they are given an opportunity to become commissioned ensigns in the Navy provided they come up to the required standard. [Loud applause.]

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, as to the pay of these boys in the Navy or the pay of the petty officers in the Navy, I have no concern whatsoever. I am simply aiming to correct an evil, a specific evil, an evil known to exist by every Member of this House, Mr. Chairman; and I have consulted some of the best minds in this House, some of the best lawyers and parliamentarians, and they tell me that my amendment as drawn and as submitted by me will effect the result that all seek to obtain; and therefore I trust the House will accept my amendment as presented by me. Mr. Chairman, I repeat again, they will not be accepting an amendment which is carelessly drawn by a novice, but they are accepting an amendment carefully drawn after advising with those who thoroughly understand what I want to get at, and who assure me that my amendment will accomplish that at which we aim—to eradicate the evil of fraudulent enlistment of these boys who enlist without the knowledge or consent of parents, guardians, or anybody except to recruiting officer and themselves. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman suggested that he desired to ask unanimous consent to change a word in his amendment.

Mr. KELIHER. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the amendment the word "written" that was left out through carelessness in presenting the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert the word "written" before the word "evidence," so as to read "certificate of birth or written evidence other than his statement," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman to correct the amendment as indicated? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to ask if the first vote will not have to be on the substitute? I offered a substitute to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts before he spoke, and sent it up to the desk.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I ask that both the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia and that of the gentleman from Massachusetts be reported. I would like to hear them both.

The amendment of Mr. KELIHER was again reported.

The substitute offered by Mr. RIXEY was read, as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the enlistment of minors under 21 years of age without the written consent of the parent or guardian.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to. [Applause.]

The Clerk commenced to read.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what the Clerk is now reading.

Mr. TAWNEY. On page 29. I understand that we are going back to an amendment offered to a section passed over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. Two paragraphs were passed by the committee without prejudice. One has been disposed of.

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to give notice now, as I did last evening, that at the end of the paragraph read last evening I propose to offer an amendment when we are ready to proceed with the bill.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, there was another matter I wanted to take up in the Bureau of Ordnance. An amendment was pending, offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks to recur to the paragraph that was passed without prejudice.

Mr. TAWNEY. At the end of line 6, page 11.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know what it is that unanimous consent is asked for.

Mr. FOSS. It does not require unanimous consent. The House has already passed the paragraph without prejudice.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it does not require unanimous consent, why should the gentleman ask for unanimous consent?

Mr. FOSS. I did not ask unanimous consent that I recollect.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph was passed without prejudice.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman on this paragraph of ordnance and ordnance stores, before taking up the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, I desire to ask a correction of the punctuation; that a semicolon be inserted by the Clerk in line 25, page 10, after the word "material"—"handling ordnance material," then a semicolon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, line 25, after "material," insert a semicolon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer a substitute for the amendment that I offered, which does not change the amendment except in the phraseology. I wrote it hurriedly, and I want simply to change the wording and to have this substitute considered instead of the original amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers a substitute for the amendment pending to the paragraph, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for shells or projectiles, except for shells or projectiles purchased in accordance with the terms and conditions of proposals submitted by the Secretary of the Navy to all of the manufacturers of shells and projectiles, and upon bids received in accordance with the terms and requirements of such proposals.

Mr. RIXEY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question. His amendment, as I understand it, only refers to the purchase of shells and projectiles?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. RIXEY. Will the gentleman object to inserting after the words "expended for" the words "the purchase of?" As the amendment is written I think it would apply to all projectiles, and I understand that some of the shells and projectiles are made by the Government, and therefore the gentleman's amendment ought to be confined to the purchase, which result will be effected by adding after the words "expended for" the words "the purchase of."

Mr. TAWNEY. I will examine my amendment and ascertain whether those words can be inserted there. It is not my purpose to deprive the Government of the opportunity of manufacturing projectiles. My information from the Navy Department is that all these projectiles are manufactured by private establishments.

Mr. RIXEY. I understand that some of the smaller shells and projectiles for test purposes at Indian Head are made by the Government.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I understood that the projectiles are made by a private concern and not by the Government.

Mr. RIXEY. I was informed on yesterday by a gentleman who ought to know that our shells and projectiles used at Indian Head were manufactured at the Washington Navy-Yard by the Government. But if they are all purchased this does not do any harm to put in the words which the amendment provides for.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will, before the amendment is voted upon, look at it, and if it is necessary to correct it in that respect I am perfectly willing to do it. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs if it is not true that under this provision of his bill, under the paragraph in lines 19 and 20, there will be expended in the next fiscal year for shells and projectiles by the Navy Department a sum aggregating about $1,000,000?

Mr. FOSS. For shells?

Mr. TAWNEY. For shells and projectiles.

Mr. FOSS. I do not know how much of this appropriation of a million dollars which provides for the supply of powder and shells will be used to purchase shells. Of course it is all available for two things, powder and shells; how much will go for powder and how much for shells I do not know.

Mr. TAWNEY. I assumed, Mr. Chairman, that in providing for an appropriation of $1,000,000 for two distinct purposes the committee had probably ascertained the amount that would be expended of that appropriation for each of the two purposes. That was the reason I asked—to ascertain whether or not the amount was not about equally divided. So that under the current appropriation for ordnance the Navy Department is now expending $495,916.50 for shells and projectiles, and if one-half of the reserve ammunition which the Department is authorized to purchase under that paragraph to which I referred a moment ago is to be expended for shells and projectiles, then there would be an aggregate expenditure for this purpose of about $1,000,000 in the next fiscal year.

My purpose, Mr. Chairman, is not to embarrass the Navy Department in the least nor to limit the amount of expenditure for this purpose. My amendment is solely and alone in the interest of better administration, and to take away from any officer in this Department the opportunity of preferring one manufacturing establishment engaged in the manufacture of material or ordnance for the Navy to the extent that they are now engaged in that manufacture, of favoring one establishment to the exclusion of other manufacturing establishments.

The amendment is in line with the uniform and long-established policy of the Government; that is, when any of the Departments desire to purchase any material they must purchase in the open market, after submitting their proposals, inviting and receiving bids for that material, in accordance with the specifications and the conditions contained in the proposal.

In the War Department we have prescribed that they can not purchase beyond $500 worth of material except by advertising. In the other Departments we have provided that not to exceed $100 can be expended except upon public proposals and inviting a public and open competitive bid for material or supplies to be purchased.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I inquire whether these provisions which the gentleman alludes to are provisions of general law.

Mr. TAWNEY. They are general law.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And apply to the other Departments?

Mr. TAWNEY. To all other Departments.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What provision is there that applies to the Navy Department?

Mr. TAWNEY. The same provisions apply to the Navy Department with the exceptions mentioned in section 3721 of the Revised Statutes. There are certain exceptions there mentioned, one of which is ordnance. That law was passed in 1847, when the Government of the United States was not expending a million dollars annually for the purchase of ordnance; when we did not have the manufacturing establishments in this country that we have to-day for the manufacture of shells and projectiles.

Now, it is said that all of our shells and projectiles used in the Navy are manufactured in private manufacturing establishments. There are four that I know of that are to-day engaged in the manufacture of these projectiles. Some of them have contracts for the manufacture of a certain class of projectiles as the result of open bids. Others are manufactured as the result of private contracts with the Navy Department. These different manufacturing establishments are all equipped for the manufacture of shells in accordance with the specifications prescribed by the Navy Department, and if they can not comply with the specifications they will not bid.

If they do bid and pretend to comply, the Navy Department requires that every one of the bids shall be accompanied with a bond to indemnify the Government against any failure to comply with the conditions of the contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the four companies that are engaged in the manufacture of these shells and projectiles are the Firth Sterling Steel Company, of Pittsburg; the Crucible Steel Company, located I do not know where; the Bethlehem Steel Company, and the Midvale Steel Company, of Philadelphia. In view of the magnitude of these purchases, in view of the fact that we have independent manufacturing establishments that are equipped and engaged in the manufacture of these shells, in view of the fact that all the shells and projectiles that are purchased by the War Department are purchased by open bids, as the result of proposals submitted by the War Department, I can not see why we should make an exception in the case of the Navy Department, and thus give to naval officers who are charged with the responsibility of making these contracts the opportunity of favoring one manufacturing establishment to the exclusion of all others engaged in manufacturing the same identical article.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What company now has the contract?

Mr. TAWNEY. My information is that there are two or three that have contracts for the manufacture of different kinds of projectiles.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. For the Navy?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Firth Steel Company has the contract in Pittsburg, and I understand the Midvale Steel Company, of Philadelphia, has the contract for another class of projectiles.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman for information. How many firms are bidding for these armor-piercing projectiles? Did he say four?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not bidding; no.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. How many firms in the United States have the capacity for making, satisfactorily, armor-piercing shells?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have given the names of four.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I understood the gentleman to say that there are other manufacturers as well equipped. Will the gentleman name them?

Mr. TAWNEY. I said that I did not have the names or the location of the other firms.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman answer me further—where did he get his information that there were other firms?

Mr. TAWNEY. I got the information first from the letter of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. That is good authority.

Mr. TAWNEY. In a letter which I will read, and further than that, from the gentleman's colleague from Philadelphia. On the 12th of April I made an inquiry of the Secretary of the Navy for the purpose of ascertaining how these purchases were made, whether or not they were made in the open market, or whether they were purchased as a result of private contracts let to these various manufacturing establishments, and on the 18th of April the Secretary replied to my letter as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 18, 1906.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 12th instant, requesting to be advised as to what the practice of this Department has been and is in respect to the letting of shell or projectile contracts; whether or not the Department advertises for bids and, if so, whether there is competitive bidding for this work; also requesting to be informed as to what these contracts amounted to in the aggregate during the last fiscal year, I have the honor to inform you that the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, to whom your letter was referred, has submitted the following report, which covers the several inquiries contained in your letter:

"A distinction must be made in stating the Bureau's policy between those projectiles for which the requirements are so simple as to bring them within the range of general competition, and those (chiefly armor-piercing shells of large calibers) for which the requirements are so exacting that only a small number of firms in the country are in a position to undertake their manufacture with any hope of success.

"With regard to the first class, the Bureau's practice is to invite bids from all manufacturers who are believed to be equipped for undertaking contracts and completing them satisfactorily.

"With regard to the second class of projectiles, which, as above noted, are principally armor-piercing shells of large caliber, the policy of the Bureau has been directed toward securing the very best that could be had, keeping in view that desirability of distributing orders in such a manner that the Department should, in the event of war, have as large a number of plants available as possible. In pursuance of this policy, contracts for shells of this class have in many cases been placed without competition, as authorized by section No. 3721 of the Revised Statutes.

"The aggregate amount of shell contracts for the past fiscal year was $495,916.50, of which $50,329 was spent for shell of the first class (as enumerated above), and $445,587.50 for shell of the second class."

Very respectfully, CHARLES J. BONAPARTE, Secretary.

Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY, M. C.,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

Now, the Secretary of the Navy in this letter admits not only the desirability of encouraging the development of the manufacture of these projectiles and shells by different manufacturing establishments, but he also admits the necessity for it, especially in case of war, and yet under the policy of the Navy Department it is within the discretion of one officer to make it impossible to carry out that policy by favoring one manufacturing establishment to the exclusion of others.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more in which to answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota may proceed for one minute. Is there any objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman the names of any firms beyond those already stated with sufficient capacity and ability to build these armor-piercing shells?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have not.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit the statement, there are five firms competing for these shells; only five firms pretending to compete for them or to make them.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, that is enough.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Why shouldn't they have open competition? I know nothing about it.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I think they should have. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have no quarrel with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, and in defense of the Department I think it is but fair to say that there has been open and wide competition, the letter of the Secretary of the Navy to the contrary notwithstanding. The Department furnishes us this morning this information. The Firth Sterling Steel Company, of Pittsburg, is a competitor; the Bethlehem Steel Company, of South Bethlehem, Pa., is a competitor, and the Crucible Steel Company, of Pittsburg, is a third competitor. The Department says that armor-piercing projectiles have been ordered from the Carpenter Steel Company, of Reading, Pa., and from the Midvale Steel Company, of Philadelphia, the contracts being three years old. Further, the Department says that these firms have not as yet been able to deliver a satisfactory shell, and most of the orders have been canceled, although the Midvale Company is still trying to furnish 1,000 5-inch, but so far without success. That is all I have to say, and I say it in fairness to the Department.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word upon this matter. There are two classes of shells, I might say, to be considered in connection with this subject. In the first place, all the 5-inch shells and below that have been open to free competition, and all concerns have had a perfect right to bid, but with these heavier armor-piercing shells it has been impossible to get any concerns to bid on them, so that the Department has gone to different companies and encouraged them to take a contract to make these armor-piercing shells—12-inch shells, for instance, which we use in our 12-inch guns.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, how does the gentleman justify that statement in the light of the information furnished by the Secretary of the Navy that they have expended almost half a million dollars for these large armor-piercing shells?

Mr. FOSS. Well, that was this last year; the year before the gentleman will find that we purchased a larger quantity of small shells.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand, and it is in view of this practice that has grown up in this last year, in view of the fact these concerns are equipped and are to-day manufacturing these armor-piercing shells, I think as a matter of protection we ought to require the same policy in respect to those which we require in respect to the others.

Mr. FOSS. I agree with the gentleman, if we can go on the market and buy them, but we can not do that.

Mr. TAWNEY. But will not the gentleman concede that, when the Navy Department submits its proposal for the purchase of these shells, that it also submits the specifications and all the terms and conditions and tests that the manufacturer must conform to in order to comply with the contract, and does not the Department, in addition to that, require a bond for the faithful performance of that contract, with ample penalties to protect the Government? There is absolutely no reason that I can see for allowing this large expenditure to be made under private contract, and I submit in all candor to the chairman of the committee that it is not good administration to place in the discretion of one officer the expenditure of a million dollars, under private contract to be made by him, for the purchase of material amounting to that sum.

Mr. FOSS. I agree with the gentleman, if there are a number of concerns which can do this work and manufacture these projectiles, but they are so difficult to make, and the specifications of the Navy Department are going up all the time, because as we get information from abroad as to the standard there in reference to armor-piercing projectiles, then our standards and our specifications go up, and it has been the most difficult matter in the world to get any company to manufacture these projectiles. Why, here, for instance, in March, 1903, requisition was placed with the Crucible Steel Company of America for 600 10-inch shells, 600 12-inch armor-piercing shells, and this requisition has not been completed, and the Bureau has been forced to cancel its order for 200 of the 10-inch shells. So it is with the Midvale Steel Company. This company had an order for a thousand, but this company has not been able to begin work on this order, inasmuch as they have been unable to develop a satisfactory experimental shell. Here an order was given to the Carpenter Steel Company. So there has been no disposition on the part of the Navy Department to shut out anybody from competition in this matter, but the disposition of the Navy Department has been to try and find somebody who would manufacture these shells. That is the point.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman says there has been no disposition to shut out any manufacturers. The Secretary of the Navy himself, in this letter, says that they have selected an establishment to manufacture these particular shells which, in their judgment, was the best equipped for the manufacture. Why, there is no competition there. Is it not shutting out every other manufacturer, if the Department goes out and selects only one and enters into a private contract with that one, without any knowledge on the part of the other contractors that the Government desires or proposes to purchase these projectiles? Is not that shutting out every other manufacturer; and if in doing that it is so necessary—and I think it is—that they should have a shell of the very best and highest quality, then why not encourage improvement in the quality of our shells by giving to all the manufacturers an opportunity to bid for these contracts?

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] has expired.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may continue his remarks for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like, in view of that permission, to ask the chairman of the committee as to whether he is aware of the fact that a half million dollars of contracts for shells were awarded during the last year, and that in making those awards one, at least, of the companies mentioned as capable of manufacturing these shells was not given an opportunity to bid, and did not know that any contracts were being given out for the making or manufacturing of these shells?

Mr. FOSS. No; I am not aware of it.

Mr. MORRELL. That is a fact.

Mr. FOSS. But the policy of the Department is to give these shells to different companies who would make them. There are comparatively few companies who have any plant in which to make them. It is not a very large business in itself. It is only a side show, I may say, to a large industrial plant, and the Department in this way has encouraged a number to undertake the manufacture of these shells, so that in time of war we can call upon a large number to manufacture them. I desire to present the views of the Bureau, as expressed in the following letters:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
BUREAU OF ORDNANCE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., May 9, 1906.

MY DEAR Mr. FOSS: Replying to your telephone message of this morning concerning the amendment to the appropriation bill providing for the advertisement of shell contracts, etc.

I have to inclose herewith copy of the Bureau's second indorsement No. 19470/1 (F) of April 17, 1906, on letter from the Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY, M. C., to the Secretary of the Navy. This indorsement briefly states the Bureau's position in the matter and also the approximate amount expended for shell under all appropriations last year.

It is our practice to advertise for target shell and common shell, and also for the smaller caliber armor-piercing shell up to 5-inch, but we have never advertised for armor-piercing shell of the larger calibers.

If armor-piercing projectile contracts are awarded to the lowest bidder, after advertisement and under our very strict specifications and with our extreme penalty clauses, most of the manufacturers would soon be put out of the projectile business, or else the Bureau would be forced to supply vessels of the Navy with shell known to be not of the best and known to be inferior to similar shell used in foreign navies. This is contrary to the policy of the Department, as we want these firms ready to furnish projectiles in an emergency, and consequently are helping them develop their plants.

We naturally want the best projectiles it is possible to obtain and want them without great delay; therefore the larger contracts are made with firms known to be able to promptly carry out the contracts in accordance with the specifications, while smaller orders are placed with other firms having the necessary plants and who desire to develop them.

For your information I also inclose herewith a list of uncompleted orders for large caliber armor-piercing shell, showing the difficulty that even the largest concerns experience in producing projectiles which will satisfactorily pass our strict specifications.

With no reserve of armor-piercing projectiles available at present, the unsatisfactory fulfillment of projectile contracts might force the Bureau to commission ships with empty shell rooms.

As far as known to this Bureau no complaints have ever been made concerning the placing of armor-piercing shell contracts without competition.

The Bureau believes there is at present only one company prepared to furnish promptly large caliber armor-piercing shell which will fully comply with its strict specifications. Both for military as well as economical reasons, however, every attempt is being made to induce other firms to successfully manufacture these projectiles. It is believed to be understood by all these companies that as soon as they are in a position to satisfactorily manufacture these shell they will receive an equitable portion of the Bureau's orders.

Finally, the Bureau considers it very undesirable at present to compel competition by advertisement for armor-piercing projectiles of the Navy.

Regretting that this has been written hastily in order to get it to you before noon, and hoping that the information will be of use, I remain,

Yours, sincerely,

N. E. MASON,
Chief of Bureau of Ordnance.

Hon. GEORGE E. FOSS, M. C.,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

[Copy of Bureau of Ordnance, second indorsement No. 19470/1 (F), of April 17, 1906, on letter from Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY, M. C., House of Representatives, to the Secretary of the Navy, requesting to be informed as to what the practice of the Navy Department has been, and is, in respect to the letting of shell or projectile contracts; whether or not the Department advertises for bids; and if so, whether there is competitive bidding for this work; also what these contracts amounted to in the aggregate during the last fiscal year.]

1. Respectfully returned to the Navy Department.

2. A distinction must be made in stating the Bureau's policy between those projectiles for which the requirements are so simple as to bring them within the range of general competition and those (chiefly armor-piercing shells of large calibers) for which the requirements are so exacting that only a small number of firms in the country are in a position to undertake their manufacture with any hope of success.

3. With regard to the first class, the Bureau's practice is to invite bids from all manufacturers who are believed to be equipped for undertaking contracts and completing them satisfactorily.

4. With regard to the second class of projectiles, which, as above noted, are principally armor-piercing shells of large caliber, the policy of the Bureau has been directed toward securing the very best that could be had, keeping in view that desirability of distributing orders in such a manner that the Department should, in the event of war, have as large a number of plants available as possible. In pursuance of this policy contracts for shells of this class have, in many cases, been placed without competition, as authorized by section No. 3721 of the Revised Statutes.

5. The aggregate amount of shell contracts for the past fiscal year was $495,916.50, of which $50,329 was spent for shell of the first class (as enumerated above) and $445,587.50 for shell of the second class.

N. E. MASON,
Chief of Bureau of Ordnance.

UNCOMPLETED REQUISITIONS FOR LARGE-CALIBER SHELL.

In March, 1903, requisition was placed with the Crucible Steel Company of America for 600 10-inch and 600 12-inch A. P. shell. This requisition has not been completed, and the Bureau has been forced to cancel its order for 200 of the 10-inch shell. Four hundred of the 12-inch shell will in all probability have to be accepted at a reduced price as target shell inasmuch as the Bureau is unwilling to place them on board ship as battle shell.

In March, 1903, requisition was placed with the Midvale Steel Company for 1,000 5-inch A. P. shell. This company has not as yet begun work on this order, inasmuch as they have been unable to develop a satisfactory experimental shell. The Bureau has been subjected to great expense in testing the various experimental shell submitted by them.

In March, 1903, 600 10-inch forged steel, 600 12-inch forged steel shell, 1,000 8-inch A. P. shell, and 2,000 7-inch A. P. shell were ordered from the Carpenter Steel Company. Orders for all these A. P. shell were canceled in October, 1905, inasmuch as the company had up to that time been unable to manufacture shell which would pass the test. Three hundred and fifty-seven of the 12-inch forged steel shell have been canceled for similar reasons

Mr. MORRELL. I would like to ask the distinguished chairman of the committee——

Mr. FOSS. If it gets down to be a matter of competition the tendency of the whole thing will be rather to reduce the price and to cheapen the shell, whereas, on the contrary, the Department has sought to improve it experimentally and raise the standard and not reduce Navy standards down to commercial standards.

Mr. MORRELL. Oh, I do not think that will be the result at all, for the reason that the board of ordnance, which passes upon these shells, if they are not up to the standard required in the contract, has the right to reject each and every one of them.

Mr. TAWNEY. And they do.

Mr. MORRELL. And they do. Now, the fact of giving open bids does not for a moment presuppose the fact that the articles furnished by these different manufacturers are going to be below the standard required by the specifications furnished by the Navy Department. I would like also to ask the distinguished chairman of the committee what the result was in the year 1900 in opening bids for armor plate to competition in the reduction of price per ton, if he remembers?

Mr. FOSS. Does the gentleman mean the price per ton for armor?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes. And whether the article furnished to-day, in view of the reduction of price per ton, which has resulted from the bids being open to competition, is any worse in quality and grade than it was previous to the reduction or previous to the time the bids were opened to competition.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is to say, do you have a poorer quality now than when the bids were not opened for competition?

Mr. FOSS. I do not think they do.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is the price less?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes; the result of opening the bids to competition has been a reduction of $150 per ton, in round figures, on all sizes, and if the result, as far as armor is concerned, of opening bids to competition has been satisfactory, why should we now presuppose the article furnished, so far as ordnance is concerned, is going to be of an inferior grade because it may be opened to competition? Competition, as a rule, lowers the price, and at the same time improves the grade of the article manufactured.

Mr. FOSS. These shells, of course, are in a more experimental stage, probably, than armor plate, but I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] if he will insert in his amendment words to the effect that they shall be of the standards of the Navy?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. There will be no objection to that.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have no objection to that at all. And it is my purpose in offering this amendment, of course——

Mr. FOSS. I want that perfectly clear.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to suggest to the gentleman that under this amendment the question of standards is left absolutely and exclusively in the discretion of the Navy Department.

Mr. MORRELL. Of course. Under the terms of the specifications.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I understand that if you insert that, it will be satisfactory.

Mr. TAWNEY. If that is satisfactory to the chairman of the committee, I will very gladly insert the language, "the standard for such shells and projectiles to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. FOSS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It covers the whole question.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The committee on yesterday, after very full debate, decided to provide for the very widest competition possible in the supply of anchors, cables, and rope, both wire and hemp. There seems to be no reason, if it is the policy of the committee in that respect, why we should not apply the same principle of wide competition to the subject of these projectiles. In this connection I desire to call attention to the letter which was presented here a few moments ago by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], bearing upon the question under discussion yesterday. I had a curiosity to see to whom that letter was addressed, and I find it was addressed to the Hon. GEORGE LOUD, a Member of Congress from the State of Michigan. Mr. LOUD, you will remember, was the gentleman who told us yesterday that he had spent a year or more of his time investigating the matter of cables, and it seems he has been able to ascertain as a result of that year's investigation that one Government-made cable on one battle ship proved defective and gave way under certain conditions.

I want to call particular attention to this, gentlemen. It is well known to any seafaring man that in weighing an anchor, if it fouls, a strain is liable to be brought on the cable which will absolutely destroy any cable that can be made. And the same thing will occur in dropping an anchor, a kink or twist may occur in the cable, and a strain will be brought upon that particular link which no cable can be made to sustain. Now, I challenge the gentleman from Ohio, and I challenge the gentleman from Michigan, to cite an instance where a United States vessel riding at anchor on a Government-made cable was ever destroyed or damaged by the parting of its cable under stress of storm or sea, or even parted a cable while at anchor. But, on the other hand, if the gentleman will give me a very little time, I can fill the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with instances of commercial ships, both sailing and steam, that have been cast away and lost, absolutely destroyed, by the parting of the commercial cables holding them to the anchors upon which they were riding. So that the letter brought forward by the gentleman from Ohio has no bearing whatever upon the contention before the Committee yesterday.

In that connection, Mr. Chairman, I send to the desk and ask to have read, and to have inserted in connection with my remarks of yesterday, two telegrams received by me bearing on this point of closing up the chain and anchor shops and rope walks of the Boston Navy-Yard.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., May 10, 1906.

Hon. ERNEST W. ROBERTS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Boston Associated Board of Trade, through its executive committee, earnestly protests against proposed closing of cordage, chain, and anchor departments at Charlestown Navy-Yard. What can we do to assist you?

JOHN N. BOYD, Secretary.

BOSTON, MASS., May 10, 1906.

Hon. ERNEST W. ROBERTS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Heartily support your position in defense of Boston Navy-Yard. Urgently protest against amendment sacrificing manufacture of anchors, chains, and rope at navy-yard at Boston for benefit of Lebanon Chain Works and American Iron and Steel Company of Lebanon. I believe you will find on investigation that Government tests on chains and anchors for Navy made in navy-yards are more rigid and thorough than contractors' tests made outside. Will Congress risk safety for crews and cruisers to give more business to contractors?

CURTIS GUILD, Jr.

Mr. ROBERTS. I will say, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, the last telegram is from the governor of the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have now modified my amendment to meet the suggestion of the gentleman in charge of the bill, and I ask that it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the substitute will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "dollars," page 11, line 6:
"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of shells or projectiles except for shells or projectiles purchased in accordance with the terms and conditions of proposals submitted by the Secretary of the Navy to all of the manufacturers of shells and projectiles and upon bids received in accordance with the terms and requirements of such proposals. All shells and projectiles shall conform to the standards prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by the distinguished gentleman is in the line with the principle involved in the discussion on yesterday in relation to the purchase of chains, anchors, and cordage, and I want to add a very brief note to what I contributed yesterday to the general topic of these purchases by bids rather than their exclusive manufacture by the Department itself.

It will be remembered that on yesterday a dispute arose between a number of gentlemen, myself among the rest, as to whether the Navy Department was the best maker of certain of the necessary factors that go to make up a ship and its equipment. I have a matter of evidence, which is better than my statement. I had to confess yesterday that the topic got beyond my personal comprehension, and I made an intimation that it was possibly beyond the apprehension and understanding of some gentlemen on the other side. I did that with all kindness and respect, and I want to show now that in the matter of the manufacture of the particular subjects covered by the amendment offered by the gentleman here, that possibly the same principle applies that applies to the making of chains, anchors, and so forth. I propose to have read at the Clerk's desk a very brief statement taken from the log of the U. S. S. Maine. I desire to say, by way of introduction to this, that it is the present battle ship Maine, and not the one that disappeared so tragically in the harbor at Habana. This is a modern ship, of the modern type—of the very best type of our war ships.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. One of the last launched.

Mr. GROSVENOR. One of the last in commission, and this is an official statement from her log, and it speaks so much more powerfully than anything I can say that I desire to have the letter read by the Clerk.

Mr. OLMSTED. Before it is read, may I ask, if that vessel is equipped with chains, does the gentleman know where they were made?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not know, and I will not venture to make any assertion, but will present the official statement that will answer the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

U. S. S. MAINE,
North River, New York, N. Y., May 9, 1906.

SIR: 1. In reference to your letter of May 3, 1906, to the Chief of Bureau of Navigation, asking for an excerpt from the log of this ship covering the subject of losing anchors, I have the honor to state that the records of the ship show that the following-mentioned cases of chain or triplet links parting had occurred prior to my taking command:

(a) In letting go the anchor on March 23, 1904, on the target range at Pensacola, Fla., one link of the "triplet" broke and the anchor was recovered.

(b) While heaving in the starboard bower chain on July 8, 1904, at anchor off Corfu, Greece, it parted, and the anchor and 25 fathoms of chain were afterwards recovered. This was due to a defective link at about 26 fathoms.

(c) While heaving in at Marthas Vineyard on September 9, 1904, the chain came in without the anchor. The examination showed that the middle link of the bending shackle triplet had broken across the weld. This anchor was lost and no trace of its buoy could be found.

(d) While heaving in off Cape Henry, Virginia, on June 1, 1905, it was found that the second link of the port triplet had parted. The anchor was recovered.

2. Since I have taken command of the Maine the following-mentioned cases have occurred:

(e) In letting go the port anchor on the target range off Barnstable, Mass., on September 22, 1905, the chain parted at the outboard link of the triplet. The anchor was recovered.

(f) In letting go the port anchor in North River on May 4, 1906, the middle link of the triplet parted almost immediately after letting go and before the anchor had touched the bottom. The anchor has been recovered.

3. The anchor chain of this ship was manufactured at the Boston Navy-Yard.

Very respectfully,

N. A. NILES,
Captain, U. S. Navy, Commanding.

Hon. GEORGE A. LOUD, M. C.,
Tenth District, Michigan,
Committee on Naval Affairs, Washington, D. C.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, that relates to the history of the casualties to the Boston chain, manufactured at the navy-yard, pertaining to a single ship. There are seven of them. I suppose that possibly you might multiply that by about the number of ships in commission. Then we could ascertain how many times these chains have broken by reason of faulty construction. So I feel that I may reiterate what I said yesterday, that the best chain made in the world is the chain made for the owners of the merchant marine of our country. I want to say that this letter which has been read is a letter written to Mr. LOUD, of the Naval Committee, and will appear in his speech of yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute to the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and the substitute was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, that same amendment is to be considered in connection with the purchase of reserve shell and projectiles, for the same thing.

In line 20, after the word "dollars," page 11, insert the amendment which has just been adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 20, after the word "dollars," page 11, insert:
"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of shells or projectiles, except for shells or projectiles purchased in accordance with the terms and conditions of proposals submitted by the Secretary of the Navy to all of the manufacturers of shells and projectiles and upon bids received in accordance with the terms and requirements of such proposals. All shells and projectiles shall conform to the standards prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment which has been agreed to, as I understand, to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] may offer an amendment to an amendment that was agreed to on yesterday, which the Clerk will report. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts send up his amendment?

Mr. WEEKS. The Clerk has my amendment. It is to add the words "after January 1, 1907," in the first line of the amendment that was adopted yesterday, after the word "dollars," in line 6, on page 6.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the word "that," the words "after January 1, 1907."

So as to read:

Provided, That after January 1, 1907, no part of said sum, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe that we are on page 29, under the head of "Navy-Yard, Washington, D. C." If we are not on that paragraph I should like to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after the word "dollars," in line 10, page 29, the following: "Brass and iron foundry, to cost $300,000, $140,000."

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reserves the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. RIXEY. I should like to have the point of order disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. RIXEY. I do not care to discuss the point of order. I am willing to submit it. There is now at the navy-yard a brass and iron foundry.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What do you want another one for?

Mr. RIXEY. I was going to explain that.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. After a minute's reflection, I think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia is in order. In order that he may not be embarrassed, and that we may discuss the facts, I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, the so-called navy-yard at Washington is really a naval gun factory. It is only used for that purpose, and up to two years ago all the guns of the Navy were finished there. For two years past that foundry has been unable to do all the work, as it had been doing, and a portion of the work for the Navy has been put out by contract. Seventy-five to 80 per cent of all the machine work on the guns is done by the Government. The forgings of the guns are purchased from outside sources; but nearly all the guns, as I stated a moment ago, are finished at the Naval Gun Factory.

It is demonstrated by the hearings before the committee that the work on the guns done at the Government factory is much better and more satisfactory than the work done by the private contractors, and is preferred by the officers and men of the Navy. I think it entirely natural that such should be the case. With the Government it is a matter of pride to have the very best guns, finished in the very best manner; whereas with the private contractor it is, to some extent at least, a matter of profit. I think I can demonstrate three propositions; first, that a foundry is badly needed at that place; second, that as a matter of economy it is to the interest of the Government to build a new one, and third, that it is absolutely necessary because the large guns are furnished entirely by only two firms, who have an agreement in regard to prices.

This foundry at the Washington Navy-Yard was built in the early seventies, not for a foundry, but was built for the Bureau of Steam Engineering, and has been used for thirty years as a foundry. It is totally inadequate, it is too small, and does not meet the needs of the Government. Some years ago Secretary Morton, a man of the highest business capacity and sagacity, called in an expert from the city of Chicago to make an examination of the naval gun factory here at Washington to see what was necessary to make it an up-to-date factory. I will read a part of the report made by this inspector, which refers to the gun factory:

This foundry is altogether inadequate. It is the poorest looking shop in the yard and is not at all in keeping with the rest of the naval gun factories. It could not even be considered a good job foundry. In this small foundry they are trying to make brass castings, bronze castings, iron castings, and steel castings, and it would be just about the proper size for the brass work alone, to say nothing of the space occupied by other work.

One of the particular features about it is that there is no foundry yard with it. All flasks have to be piled up in the foundry or else carted to a yard or vacant space a long way from it, and it is so cluttered and full that it is almost imposible to get through it. The men are fairly crowding each other in their work.

The master mechanic is not responsible for the condition of the foundry. It is due entirely to the fact that the foundry is too small and to the fact that they have no yard room to put anything in; so we can not blame him for the unbusinesslike appearance of his department. This foundry is very important, and should be enlarged to at least five times its present size.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for ten minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that his time be extended ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIXEY. So, Mr. Chairman, the report of this expert collected by the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Morton, condemns this factory and recommends that we ought to have a foundry there at least five times the size of the one that it there now, which was erected for another purpose. If it is to be the policy of this Government to finish its guns at this foundry, we ought to have a good equipment, so that the work can be done economically and in the best manner.

I will state here that this is not a new proposition suggested by any member of the committee. The recommendation for the foundry at the Naval Gun Factory came last year from the Secretary of the Navy and it was voted out by the committee. Again the Navy Department recommends this year an allowance for a new foundry. It is stated, Mr. Chairman, by the superintendent at the gun fatcory, Captain Leutze, that if he had a proper foundry at this gun factory that he could save to the Government $50,000 a year. He says under present conditions in order to do the work they frequently have to run three shifts a day, which is a continual running for the twenty-four hours. He has always to run two shifts, with the result that the people who work at night do not do as efficient work as those who work in the daytime. There is no yard attached to the foundry, and material has to be carted off some distance and then brought back again. All those things add greatly to the expense. He says that if you will give him sufficient space and a proper foundry he can save 20 per cent of the money expended for labor—a saving which would amount to from $30,000 to $36,000 a year.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, he says that, owing to the want of space in the foundry, he is unable to use steel in the place of bronze, and, having to use bronze, costs the Government $28,000 a year more than it would cost if he could use steel in place of it.

So that if a new foundry is given him, to cost $300,000, he would save the Government on these two items, in labor and in the fact that he could use steel in the place of bronze, not less than $50,000 and perhaps as much as $60,000; if $60,000, it would be 20 per cent on the investment on the whole cost of the foundry.

This item comes to us with the recommendation of the Department, and strong testimony as to the necessity from the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance and from the superintendent of the gun factory. Not one particle of testimony has been produced before the committee to show that the gun factory was not a necessity. So far as I am advised, Mr. Chairman, every member of the committee is willing to admit——

Mr. BENNET of New York. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. RIXEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the matter covered by the amendment has the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. RIXEY. I do. Moreover, it was recommended by the Secretary of the Navy last year also. It came in the estimates by the Department, and is thus recommended by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is there any recommendation independent of the estimates, any specific recommendation?

Mr. RIXEY. No specific recommendation except his statement that he thought it was proper.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. He recommended it simply by forwarding the estimate?

Mr. RIXEY. No; the estimates that went up from the different navy-yards all over the country amounted to $42,000,000. They were cut down by Admiral Endicott, to whom they were sent, to $15,000,000. Then they were revised by the Secretary of the Navy, and he cut them down to $9,000,000. That is the record in regard to the Navy Department.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But the Department did not cut this estimate out?

Mr. RIXEY. No; it retained it and turned it over to the Naval Committee.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Did he make any independent, specific recommendation?

Mr. RIXEY. No; he did not. I do not think it is referred to in the Secretary's report.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Is there any expression from the Secretary of the Navy in favor of this more than may be drawn from the mere fact that the estimates were sent to the Naval Affairs Committee?

Mr. RIXEY. I think there is. He referred to it in his hearing before the committee. He said he thought it was a proper expenditure; that there might be other items just as important and probably fully as important, but this was a proper expenditure. I refer the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the printed testimony at page 1102. We gave elaborate hearings on this question as to the necessity for the gun factory. There was no testimony but what went to show the necessity for the building. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that where the testimony is uncontradicted that the expenditure of $300,000 would result in an annual saving to the Government of $50,000, it is a good investment, and that it ought to be ordered and that without delay.

Now, then, another question. There is another reason why this yard should be maintained and kept in a high state of efficiency. There are only two firms which make the 12-inch guns, and those two firms are the Bethlehem Steel Company and the Midvale Steel Company, and the testimony before the committee was that these two firms always bid identically the same amount.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I will give the only bid that they have made. On four 12-inch guns, weight, finished, 118,552 pounds, the Bethlehem Steel Company bid $51,644.80 and the Midvale Steel Company bid $83,757, a difference of $32,000. The gentleman says that their bid was identically the same.

Mr. ROBERTS. That is on armor. They bid the same on armor. That is what the gentleman from Virginia meant.

Mr. RIXEY. No; I did not mean that. I meant what I stated.

Mr. ROBERTS. They bid the same on armor plate.

Mr. RIXEY. I am not talking of armor plate, and adhere to my statement that the Bethlehem and Midvale companies bid the same for the 12-inch guns. I am referring to the testimony before the committee, and I stand by my statement.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. The price of one was 4.36 cents per pound and of the other a little over 7 cents.

Mr. RIXEY. For what gun was that?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. The 12-inch gun.

Mr. RIXEY. When was it?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I have not the date. They are the only ones that they ever contracted for.

Mr. RIXEY. Oh, that may be ten years ago.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Oh, no; they are not delivered yet.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I stand by my statement.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman permit me to finish my statement?

Mr. RIXEY. Yes.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I would like to read all of these bids. On 6-inch guns, the weight of which was 19,156 pounds, the Bethlehem price was $12,850 and the Midvale price $12,283; on 7-inch guns, weighing 28,300 pounds, the Bethlehem price was $19,990 and the Midvale price $14,315; on the 8-inch guns, weighing 41,780 pounds, the Bethlehem bid was $21,690 and the Midvale bid $17,142; and on the 10-inch guns, weighing 79,300 pounds, the Bethlehem bid was $43,800 and the Midvale bid $45,230.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Virginia may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, my statement was that the testimony before the committee showed that only two of the factories furnished the large guns and that their bids always were identically the same. I read from the printed hearings on page 249:

Mr. RIXEY. Isn't this a fact, that the bids from the different steel plants are always the same for practically the same thing?

Admiral MASON. The bids for forgings from two of the larger companies are now always identical in price and nearly always in time of delivery, while the bid of a third large company for forgings up to those intended for 7-inch guns is generally slightly lower (1 cent per pound), but with much longer times of delivery. In armor bids two firms generally submit identical bids, while a third goes lower. There is evidently keen competition, however, in finished guns, mounts, and other ordnance material, as evidenced by the bids received.

Mr. RIXEY. Which are those three larger companies?

Admiral MASON. The Bethlehem and the Midvale Steel companies are the first two I have just mentioned, while the Crucible Steel Company is the third.

Mr. THOMAS of Ohio. What has this all got to do with the foundry that we are discussing—the iron foundry? That has nothing to do with the forging of steel.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I have discussed the necessity for the foundry and am now discussing a matter that vitally concerns the gun factory and the Government. If this factory here in Washington does not finish up these guns, then the Government is bound to have the guns finished by the private contractors, and the only people engaged in that business so far as the 12-inch guns are concerned are the Bethlehem and the Midvale people, who bid the same price and are trying to drive the Government from doing its own work.

Mr. THOMAS of Ohio. Does the gentleman think that these guns are to be finished in this proposed foundry?

Mr. RIXEY. In part, certainly. But I have discussed the foundry and am now referring to the combination which controls and furnishes the heavier steel forgings.

Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

Mr. RIXEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York. If the gentleman reads the hearing he will see that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Confirming the statement of the gentleman from Virginia that the bids were identical, I wish to call his attention to page 536 of the report of the Secretary of the Navy: "Abstract of offers for furnishing supplies or services, and which were contracted for by the Bureau of Ordnance during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and contracts awarded thereon. Twelve-inch, 10-inch, and 8-inch gun forgings (advertisements of June 27, 1904), Bethlehem Steel Company, per pound, 30 cents; Midvale Steel Company, per pound, 30 cents"——

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me read this first.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. No one denies that. That price was fixed by the Government, however.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me read this, and then the gentleman can make his statement. "Contract was made with the Bethlehem Steel Company August 13, 1904. Contract was made with the Midvale Steel Company August 1, 1904. One hundred sets 3-inch gun forgings (advertisement of October 22, 1904), Bethlehem Steel Company, plain steel, per pound, 32 cents; nickel steel, per pound, 40 cents; Midvale Steel Company, same price." This shows conclusively the gentleman's statement is accurate that the bids were identical.

Mr. RIXEY. My statement——

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. The Government made these prices by a law passed by Congress limiting them to a certain price on armor plate and gun forging to 30 cents per pound.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Government advertised for bids, and bids were submitted, and the bids were identical by the companies, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Let me ask the gentleman from New York if some Congress some time back did not pass a law limiting the price the Government should pay for armor plate and gun forgings?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was for armor plate.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. The price to be paid was not to exceed 30 cents on gun forgings, and on the armor plate I do not know what the price was.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all, because here are bids of 32 cents a pound which were accepted by the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I have been interrupted so often that I would ask to have my time extended.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given five more minutes.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to agree upon some time on this proposition, otherwise it will run along all the afternoon. I would like to ask how much time the gentleman from Virginia has had.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has occupied fifteen minutes.

Mr. VREELAND. I want at least ten minutes on this.

Mr. FOSS. I ask unanimous consent that the time upon this paragraph and amendments be forty-five minutes, one-half hour in opposition and fifteen minutes more to those in favor of the proposition offered by the gentleman from Virginia. That will give half an hour on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that debate upon the paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed at the expiration of forty-five minutes, and that thirty minutes of that time be accorded to those who are opposed to the pending amendment and fifteen minutes in addition to what has already been occupied be given to those in favor of the amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I will be compelled to object to that at this time, and I will ask my friend to withhold his request for five minutes and we will confer and see if we can not agree.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You can not go on without unanimous consent, anyhow.

Mr. RIXEY. I submit I have the floor at present and I would like for this request to be made after I get through.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. RIXEY. But request was made that I have five minutes additional time, and I will try to get through by that time. I understood the gentleman from Connecticut to submit that request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia may continue his remarks for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSS. Then, I want to give notice, Mr. Chairman, at the end of five minutes I shall ask unanimous consent for this; and in case unanimous consent is not given, I shall move to close the debate on this paragraph and pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Virginia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RIXEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, as further evidence that it is necessary to have this factory to protect the Government, the further fact appeared in the hearing that the two companies that furnished, and the only two companies that furnished, the larger forgings furnished these forgings at a greater price than was their price for the finished gun. Captain Leutze says——

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. It is not a correct statement.

Mr. RIXEY. I am going to read you what he said. Captain Leutze says:

> The rough forgings for 12-inch gun weigh nearly 166,000 pounds and cost a little over $52,500. The finished gun in the gun factory costs $61,770.61, including the yokes and cost of forgings. The contractor's bid for the finished gun is $51,644.80.

This is something over $900 less for the finished gun than for the forging. I am very sure that Admiral Mason made the same statement.

Mr. VREELAND. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to yield, but I have only five minutes.

Mr. VREELAND. I will make it very brief.

Mr. RIXEY. I will yield for a question.

Mr. VREELAND. I will ask the gentleman if he will not, before he concludes, give us the bearing the argument has on the amendment he has offered? He knows very well that the finishing of these 12-inch guns by these two companies has nothing whatever to do with the foundry.

Mr. RIXEY. I want the gentleman to tell me in his own time why it has nothing to do with it. I say it does have something to do with it. I have stated it over and over again, and I will repeat that these guns are now finished at the gun factory, and that in order that the Government may do that work it is necessary to have a new foundry there. If it does not get this new foundry, then these big guns will have to be furnished by outside parties, and there are only two, the Bethlehem or the Midvale Company, which bid identically the same amount.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Do they finish any big guns now at the foundry?

Mr. RIXEY. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. What proportion of the guns do they finish at the foundry?

Mr. RIXEY. I can not tell you the proportion, but up to about two years ago they finished all the guns, big and little, at the factory. Now they are unable to do so, and some of them have to be finished by the parties who furnish the forgings—the Bethlehem and Midvale companies—and they are trying to force the Government out of the business by offering to furnish the finished gun for less than they furnish the forgings.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. But they do not.

Mr. RIXEY. They do.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I have got the figures here.

Mr. RIXEY. I do not care what you have. I have not your figures, but I have the testimony of the superintendent of the navy-yard, which I have already given you.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Figures are better than testimony.

Mr. RIXEY. I have already referred to the testimony which will be inserted. I repeat again that it shows that the Bethlehem and Midvale companies, the only companies which furnish the big forgings for the 12-inch guns, offered to furnish the finished product for less price than they would furnish the rough forgings.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. That is not correct.

Mr. RIXEY. I say it is correct.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. It is not the fact. They are not the figures in the Department.

Mr. RIXEY. I am talking about the evidence before the Naval Committee. I never heard of your figures until to-day. I have no reason for disbelieving the statements of Admiral Mason and Captain Leutze, both officers of the United States Navy and honorable men and placed at the head of their Department by the Secretary himself.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will the gentleman from Virginia permit a question?

Mr. RIXEY. I will.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. The gentleman does not wish to be understood that he does not care what the facts are in the case?

Mr. RIXEY. I want the facts, and I think I have stated the facts. I only know the developments before the committee. The gentleman may have evidence which I have not seen. If so, I will be glad to have it. I state again that the testimony before the Naval Committee, and there was nothing to contradict it, was that the Bethlehem company and the Midvale company, the only two companies that furnish the 12-inch forgings, offered to furnish the finished product for a less price than they furnished the rough forgings, and that the two companies always bid the same price for the 12-inch forgings.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman used?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty minutes.

Mr. FOSS. Then I ask unanimous consent that debate be closed in fifty minutes—fifteen minutes more to be taken by that side in favor of the proposition and thirty-five minutes on this side. That gives equal division of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be continued for fifty minutes, fifteen minutes of the time to be given to Members who are in favor of the pending amendment and thirty-five minutes to those opposed to the amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. RIXEY. I ask the gentleman, who has got thirty-five minutes, to give us twenty-five minutes. If I had known my time was to be limited, I would not have taken as much time as I did, and there were a good many interruptions, and gentlemen got their statements in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. RIXEY. I will have to object. Give us twenty-five minutes.

Mr. DAWSON. I would like to ask what particular necessity there is for clapping the lid on this debate. We ran along all day yesterday on the question of chains and cordage, and this is an important subject, it seems, that is before us, and why should we not run along on this?

Mr. VREELAND. We have other matters that are to come before Congress besides this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. RIXEY. I will have to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia objects.

Mr. FOSS. I will make this request: That all debate be closed in one hour, twenty minutes of the time to be taken by that side and forty minutes by this side. That would make an equal division of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendment thereto be closed in one hour, twenty minutes of the time—one-third of the time—to be occupied by those in favor of the pending amendment and forty minutes by those opposed to the amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the twenty-five minutes, because a good deal of the time I took was consumed by gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. FOSS. I will modify the request so that the gentleman will have twenty-five minutes and our side thirty-five.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois as modified? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Chairman, my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY], of course knows that the principal part of the time which he occupied was in talking about a subject which is not before the committee on this amendment. He has offered an amendment for the purpose of adding to the foundry down at the gun factory plant. The changes that his argument would bring about would be the building of the 12-inch gun forgings by the Government, and the amount for building that plant would be, according to the figures of the Department, $4,000,000, and according to our experience of such undertakings would cost six or seven million dollars.

Mr. RIXEY. The gentleman knows I did not refer to forgings at all.

Mr. VREELAND. I know that the gentleman spent a good share of his time in showing what the bids of two companies were for the forgings that we use on the 12-inch guns.

Mr. RIXEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. VREELAND. Now, at the foundry they make castings only.

Mr. RIXEY. My reference was intended to be to the finished gun and not to the furnishing of the forgings.

Mr. VREELAND. They are not furnishing forgings or making forgings in the foundry. That is where they make castings.

Mr. RIXEY. It is not for the forgings at all. I disclaim any such purpose. There was no such evidence before the committee in the hearings. It was for the finished guns that I was speaking.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What has the foundry to do with forgings?

Mr. VREELAND. I suppose the gentleman does not contend before this committee that in this $300,000 foundry, which he proposes to build, they are going to make forgings for 12-inch guns? Therefore the situation would not be relieved by his amendment, and we will still have to buy the forgings where we buy them now unless we go on and build this great gun plant that the gentleman's amendment proposes to this House.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Naval Affairs finds, as every other committee in this House finds, that every man in charge of a plant in this Government wants to magnify its importance. He wants to increase the appropriations and the number of men employed in the plant of which he has charge. The first that we heard of the enlargement of this gun factory, where 4,000 men are now employed, was from Captain Pendleton, former superintendent, two years ago.

He came before the committee with the same story that Captain Leutze brought there this year. He told us how much more cheaply the guns could be made in the gun factory than we were buying them. But we were not impressed by his argument. We found that in figuring the cost of these guns he left out items which would entirely reverse his position, just as Captain Leutze has left them out in his testimony which he presented this year. He desired to have an item of more than $100,000 for the leave of the men taken out and made a special appropriation, so that it need not be charged against the cost of the guns. Now, there is one excuse, Mr. Chairman—or perhaps I should say one reason—why the Government of the United States is justified in building a manufacturing plant and competing with the private manufacturers of the country. That is where the product which we desire to buy is tied up in the hands of an inexorable trust, where the Government is forced to pay prices which are too high, and from which there is no escape. But, Mr. Chairman, nothing of that kind exists in this case. I have here a list of the bids that have been made for castings during the past year and the present year. In every case the competition comes from five or six, and in some instances eight different firms, the majority of them outside of the American Steel Foundry Company, which I understand is a trust.

Now, the Captain told us that one reason why he could save a great deal of money was because he was obliged to pay about 12.3 cents on an average for the castings which he bought, but the Captain is mistaken on this, as he is on other of his facts. I have here the lowest bid which was accepted from all these different companies, dozens of them, during the last year. There is not one of them that reaches the figures named by the Captain. I want to read a list of the accepted bids on the material that went into that foundry. Here are the figures: Six and five-tenths cents, 6.55, 9.24, 5.15, 4.5, 5.9, 4.4, 4.75, 5.9, and 12. Why, our friend the Captain never has been a manufacturer.

[The time of Mr. VREELAND having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. VREELAND. This gentleman never has had experience as a manufacturer. He knows nothing about figuring up the cost of these things. He can not be expected to know. He was educated by the Government of the United States as a naval officer, and has spent his life upon the sea, where he belongs, commanding the ships of the United States Navy. Gentlemen talk about the cheapness of turning out guns down in this plant. The Captain testified before our committee that there was invested in this Washington Gun Factory $24,000,000 in round numbers. What was the entire product of the factory for the last year?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Will my colleague submit to a question?

Mr. VREELAND. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman say that Captain Leutze testified that there were $24,000,000 invested down there?

Mr. VREELAND. That is what I stated.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I just wanted to be clear about it.

Mr. VREELAND. I do not stop to give the exact figures.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I do not mean to interrupt my colleague.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You simply want to emphasize his statement.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. DAWSON. Did not that include the value of the product down there as well as the value of the plant?

Mr. VREELAND. I think I will have to look it up finally and read what the gentleman did say.

Will you be kind enough—

Mr. BUTLER asked—to include in your report what it has cost the Government up to this time to build that plant as it now is?

Mr. DAWSON. You will find it on page 1141 of the hearings. Captain Leutze says the whole outfit last year when he took charge was estimated at $25,000,000, so far as land and material and everything was concerned.

Mr. VREELAND. I will give the gentleman the benefit of the figures. Captain Leutze was asked:

Will you estimate the gun-factory plant, what it is worth, including the value of the land, material, shops, tools, and all?

And he says in reply, $24,001,000. Now, suppose we strike out $4,000,000 for material on hand and call it $20,000,000 invested in that plant.

Suppose you figure the interest at 2 per cent, and it is certainly worth that in the pockets of the taxpayers, you would have $400,000. Suppose you figure 5 per cent for depreciation, and any manufacturer in the country figures 10 per cent, you would have $1,000,000. Leaving out all the other charges figured against a plant by owners of it in private business, you will find that these items alone amount to $600,000 or $700,000, more than the entire output of the plant. Then talk about the economy of producing guns in this gun factory!

Mr. Chairman, this proposition has been before our committee for the past three years. It has not commended itself to us. We do not want to undertake to expend four or five or six million dollars in enlarging this present plant. Our investigation goes to show that not only here, but elsewhere where the Government manufactures its own product, it invariably costs us more than it does to buy of private manufacturers. Why, we have just been building two battle ships to determine whether it would cost more in a Government yard than it would in a private yard. We have found that it costs more to build precisely the same ship in a navy-yard—$400,000 or $500,000 more—than it would cost to build the same ship by private contract. Now, I am in favor of maintaining one plant in the United States where we can turn out a battle ship, because I believe it is worth its cost to the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

Mr. VREELAND. I will yield to the gentleman in a minute. I believe it is worth its cost to the United States to have one plant that is able to build any battle ship for the Navy. I believe that it acts as a restraint on the shipbuilding firms of this country against combination. Mr. Chairman, when we come to the question of economy, when we come to the question of saving to the taxpayers of the Government by private manufacture, I have never seen an instance where it could be shown that such a fact exists. Now I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman if he knows how much it costs to build the Louisiana, which is being built at Newport News?

Mr. VREELAND. The information before the committee seems to show that it costs something like $400,000 less than the Connecticut, which is built in the Brooklyn Navy-Yard.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I simply wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is impossible to tell to-day how much ships being built by contract cost. I have figures which show that up to date it has cost very close to the limitation placed on the cost in the act authorizing it.

Mr. THOMAS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia evidently did not understand my question, as he was certainly confused between a foundry and a machine shop. His amendment calls for a foundry, and he proceeds at once to talk about finishing guns. The gentleman evidently is a very good lawyer, but he certainly can not know much about a foundry or he would not talk about finishing guns in a foundry.

Mr. RIXEY. The gentleman from Ohio is a member of the Naval Committee, and he knows that this building has always been referred to as a foundry. He knows that in all of the hearings it was referred to the fact that the guns were finished at the foundry. It is called "the naval gun foundry."

Mr. THOMAS of Ohio. I never understood anything of the sort. I do not believe anybody versed in the iron business would refer to a place where they finish guns as a "foundry."

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment made by the gentleman from Virginia pertaining to an appropriation for an additional foundry at the Washington Navy-Yard, as I do not believe that the interests of the Government can be best conserved by making same at this time.

The information that I have gathered regarding the present conditions was obtained mainly through personal observations and through conversation with Capt. E. H. C. Leutze, the present commandant or superintendent of the navy-yard. Upon examining the report of the commandant, I was amazed at the lax expenditure of money for the employment of skilled mechanics, who are not able, mainly on account of the poor facilities of the present foundry, to do their work efficiently, and I am constrained to say just a word or two on this subject.

According to the report referred to, there are employed in the foundry 227 molders in a space 260 feet by 113 feet. The fact is patent that there is not sufficient space for the number of men employed. They are literally stepping over one another. There is no question but that the present foundry is inadequate in size to make all of the castings required by the Government at this time; yet it must be admitted from the dimensions given that it is one of the largest in the country. But if the same policy is to be continued by the management as heretofore, there is no reason to expect that the congestion will be relieved. Why it should have been thought necessary to plod on in a rut when molding machines, pneumatic machines, and other up-to-date appliances could have been procured is a question that I think should appeal to every fair-minded man. I am not arguing for a reduction of men, understand, but for better results by the same number of men, and with less effort, making it easier on the men. It is stated that there is not sufficient room for machines. Then why should the number of employees have been augmented to the detriment of the work in general when by the erection of a few little buildings machines could have been installed and the product increased many fold?

The practice now in vogue at the navy-yard is to work the molders in two shifts, but anyone at all conversant with a foundry knows that this plan is an extravagant way of doing that class of work. It is admitted that the men on the night shift are unable to turn out more than 75 per cent of the work accomplished by the day molders. And I do not doubt it. The wonder is that they are capable of doing as much. For a casting may take three hours or it may take three days to cool, depending upon its size. Hence there is so much floor space wasted or delayed which can not be used by the oncoming shift.

Then, again, Mr. Chairman, I understand that all of the men employed are high-class molders—not laborers, but molders—all of them receiving molders' wages. There is not a first-class foundry in the country that would tolerate such a practice from a business standpoint. After all, Mr. Chairman, it is not so much a question of appropriating money for an additional foundry as it is a question of better management in the present one. It is no conclusive argument to assert that the molds are heavier in the Government plant than in other foundries, and therefore require more skilled help. If that be the case, there is a justifiable reason why there should be a decided reduction in the cost of producing them.

Not alone in the failure to provide laborers is the management subject to criticism, but also in the lack of machine facilities. It is fair to assume that in the foundry practice here there are many castings being made in duplicate. Then why should they not be made in a molding machine? This machine can be made to turn out a very large tonnage, and particularly on small castings as required by the Government. Two men with such a machine can do more work in eight hours than twelve molders without a machine could possibly do. This statement may be doubted by those who have not had experience with the molding machine, but its truth can be thoroughly established by a little investigation.

Government enterprise, as well as public office, is a public trust; and if private concerns can make money out of their foundry product, I do not see why the Government should not profit likewise. Yet it is admitted in this report that the cost of the product is higher than the selling price of outside corporations. Instead of being antiquated in management and method, a Government institution like this foundry should be found abreast of the times, if not just a little ahead of them. It is a good principle—

> To be not the first by whom the new is tried,
> Nor yet the last to lay the old aside.

But the Government follows neither of these injunctions.

It seems to me that if we are to run a foundry it should be the highest type of its kind on this continent. It should be a model for the foundries of the nation. It should be the mecca for the mechanics of the country. New devices and new methods should be immediately installed, judgment passed upon them, and condemned or approved, as the case might be.

I desire it to be understood that I am making no personal accusations against anyone connected with the management of the foundry, but I do insist that the policy thus far in control of the manufacture of castings is one of shortsighted business economy. I do not question the honesty or the integrity of the officials in charge, but I do claim that it would be far wiser for the Department to consult with experienced men out of the business world and possibly appoint a temporary board of experts to outline a practice that would be conducive to the best interests of the Government.

I insist that if this foundry is to be run on business principles, it would be far wiser to employ a foundry expert than it is to trust the expenditure of all this money to the inexperienced judgment of naval officials.

If you were in the foundry business you would not think of employing a naval captain to manage it any more than you would consider it proper for a foundry man to be placed in charge of a ship. One is as incongruous as the other.

Those who advance the argument in favor of an extensive foundry that there is a possibility of combination or collusion among manufacturers to maintain prices, show a lack of familiarity with the iron industry of the United States. When we consider the fact that this land is fairly dotted with small foundries, it is a manifest absurdity to suppose that a sufficient number could so combine as to control prices. Every city and almost every town of any importance supports one or more foundries. With all this competition, Mr. Chairman, if the Government finds it impossible to purchase iron castings at reasonable prices, there must be very poor management, to say the least. Too often we are prone to blame outside influences for deficiencies in our own make-up. To be specific, if the cost of gray iron castings is 3 cents per pound, when they can be purchased in the open market for much less, the fault is not in external combinations, but in our own lax managerial methods.

And the need of cities and towns for small foundries is as great, to my mind, as the need of the Government for a large foundry. Understand, the scope of my argument is not so much in opposition to the Government's going into the foundry business on a large scale as it is in favor of better management of the industries which it now controls. I mention the need of the country for these small institutions to show the utter impracticability of their being blotted out. They are, moreover, a necessity if we would foster the spirit of initiative and industry among small investors. To expect to build a nation out of citizens whose power of initiative is dwarfed by the growth of trusts and their allied principle, governmental ownership, to expect to build an enduring nation on such treacherous ground is foolish and unscientific.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for two minutes more in order that he may finish his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to object, but I desire to suggest that it is a pity there is no quorum present to hear so good a speech as the gentleman is making. I suggest there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, there was no point of order raised.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, certainly there was.

Mr. BATES. Did the gentleman intend to make the point of order?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I not only intended to make it, but I did make it. One does not have to say "a point of order." If he suggests there is no quorum present he makes the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri, the Chair thinks, has raised the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventeen present, a quorum, and the point of order is overruled. The gentleman from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. THOMAS of Ohio. But that point is neither here nor there if we wish to show that the efficiency of a foundry can or can not be improved by merely increasing its size. To increase the size of something already inefficient only adds the opportunity for further conduct along the same line. To cover the glaring errors of mismanagement by extended facilities only affords room for the growth of those same practices. Let them show us first that they are doing the best they can do under the circumstances; show us first that affairs are now economically conducted; show us first that this "tree can bring forth good fruit," and then we will put more trees in the orchard. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I was struck with how the statement of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] that the Bethlehem Steel Company and the Midvale Steel Company were charging us more for the rough forging of a 12-inch gun than they would furnish the completed gun for flushed some of the gentlemen upon this floor.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Why, that statement is not true. Will the gentleman let me read the figures?

Mr. GREGG. And how quick some of them were to rise up and say it was not true, and others to say that even if true it had no bearing on the question.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. Not just now.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman allow me to give him the figures?

Mr. GREGG. I prefer not to let the gentleman inject his figures into my remarks. I have some here myself—figures given at the hearings of the committee when everyone could cross-examine the witness, and not ex parte figures.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Then the gentleman can read them.

Mr. GREGG. My time is so limited I must decline to yield further.

I am proceeding now to show that the statement of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] is true, and then later I propose to show what bearing it has on the matter under consideration, which is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] to provide an appropriation of $300,000 to build and equip an adequate gun factory at the Washington Navy-Yard.

Captain Leutze, the superintendent of the navy-yard, was before the Committee on Naval Affairs. He is an honorable and truthful man. His word is much more to be relied on than are figures brought here, we know not from where, nor by whom compiled, nor their date, nor anything about them.

Here is what he says, on page 1142 of the committee hearings, in answer to questions asked him by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] and myself:

Mr. GREGG. The result is the same. As you don't make them, they charge you for the forgings for a 12-inch gun more than they sell the completed gun for?

Captain LEUTZE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. How much difference is there between the cost of the forging and the completed gun?

Captain LEUTZE. Well, I could not say; I would have to know the weight of the forgings first. (The finished gun was offered $900 less than we have to pay for the rough forgings.)

Mr. BUTLER. How much does the Government pay for the forging of a 12-inch gun?

Captain LEUTZE. My best recollection at present is 45 cents a pound. (I find that this price was for the yoke forgings; the other forgings cost 30 cents per pound.)

Mr. BUTLER. In dollars and cents, how much?

Captain LEUTZE. I know what the gun weighs finished, but I don't know what each part—but I can give you that. (The forgings cost $52,500.)

Mr. BUTLER. Also give us the cost for the completed gun.

Captain LEUTZE. Yes, sir; the gun costs to complete it, labor, miscellaneous material, and shop expense, $9,270, added to the $52,500 for the rough forgings, makes a total of $61,770.

Mr. BUTLER. And state if you can buy the completed gun for the same amount of money that you pay for the forgings in the rough.

Captain LEUTZE. Yes, sir; in the case of the 12-inch gun. (In fact, the contract price was $900 less than what we paid for rough forgings.)

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Why wouldn't it be good economy to buy the finished gun and not build this foundry? What does it cost the Government to make that gun that they can buy for $900 less than the forgings?

Mr. GREGG. It costs about $10,000 to finish it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Ten thousand dollars more than they can buy it for? I would like to ask the gentleman if he is here advocating $10,000 apiece more for these guns than we can buy them for? Does the gentleman advocate the position that the Government should pay $10,000, according to his own statement, more for the privilege of making the gun than they can buy the gun for all finished?

Mr. GREGG. The very questions asked by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] show the relevancy of the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY], that the Midvale company and the Bethlehem company charge us more for the rough forgings than for the finished gun, and that relevancy is that these two concerns have made a combination to charge so much for the rough forgings that the gun factory can not complete the gun for the same amount they can, and thereby furnish an argument on this floor that the gun factory work comes too high, and that therefore this amendment should not be adopted, and that all work of the gun factory should be discontinued. If this amendment is defeated, their conspiracy will be but half accomplished; their victory will not be complete until the work at the Government factory is discontinued in whole. By defeating this amendment the Government is only crippled; by the latter it will be placed hors de combat and completely at their mercy. I for one will not be a party to a scheme to cripple the Government in order that it may hereafter be completely unhorsed, but as long as I am in this House I will favor giving the Government such facilities at the gun factory as will enable it to fight these two concerns to a finish.

These two concerns now have a monopoly on the forgings for this size gun, and rob us on their price, and who doubts, if we abandon the gun factory and give them a monopoly on the finishing work, that they will then run up the price of the finished gun and rob us both on the forgings and finishing work.

The object of the amendment under consideration is not only to prevent the abandonment of the gun factory, but its purpose is also to enlarge it and increase its facilities, that we may do the work cheaper than we are now doing it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. What is the difference between the Government being robbed and robbing itself?

Mr. GREGG. I want us to fix ourselves so we will not be robbed, and to do this it may become necessary for the Government to equip itself so it can make these forgings.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Why not go a step further and make the pig iron?

Mr. GREGG. I have no information about manufacturing pig iron. We have a foundry at which we make forgings for the smaller guns. Enlarging it so that we can make them for the larger guns is a very different thing from going into the business of manufacturing pig iron.

Mr. VREELAND. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. Yes.

Mr. VREELAND. I was going to ask the gentleman what relief would be afforded by building this gun factory, assuming the condition of affairs is as stated, but he has already answered the question by stating that he is in favor of building the foundry, which means not this appropriation before the committee, but an expenditure of five or six million dollars.

Mr. GREGG. The gentleman is mistaken in his figures. I suppose he refers to a plan submitted in 1903 for the expansion and enlargement of the Washington Navy-Yard, the entire estimated cost of which was about $3,000,000. The foundry of which he speaks is only a part of that, just as the gun factory is only a part.

The only thing involved now is the enlargement of the gun factory. The foundry for making forgings is not, but if it ever does come up, and conditions are the same as now, I think it would be good business to enlarge the foundry, too. As said before, the enlargement of the gun factory is the only question up now, and it does not involve any other part of the general plan, and while before the committee Captain Leutze said he regarded the gun factory necessary, leaving out everything else of the general plan.

We now have a gun factory, but it is inadequate to the needs of the Government, and by reason of this inadequacy the cost of production is increased. It has no yard. The material to be used has to be piled at different places, which makes it necessary to handle it back and forth repeatedly, and all this extra handling of the material adds unnecessarily and heavily to the cost of labor. This amendment proposes to give them a yard. And, besides, they use in the manufacture of ordnance a large quantity of bronze castings. It is shown that steel castings are much more desirable for the purposes for which the bronze are used; but they can not use the steel, because they have no facilities for making them. This amendment proposes to give them such facilities. And, besides, the floor space is not large enough to work the men to advantage. They have to be worked in a day shift and a night shift; and Captain Leutze shows that the wages paid the men engaged in the night shift is the same as the wages paid those engaged in the day shift, while the output of those on the night shift is only about 75 per cent of those engaged on the day shift. Considering the great number of men employed (948), the loss in this respect to the Government is immense. It is proposed by this amendment to enlarge the floor space so that there will be no night shift, and thereby prevent this large decrease in the efficiency and output of labor.

The adoption of the amendment will increase the facilities of the gun factory, so that we can hereafter do all the work there cheaper than we are doing it.

The only effect of a defeat of the amendment will be to continue to hamper the Government, and the next step will be a proposition to stop the Government from doing any of the work, on the ground that it is too expensive, which will be a complete surrender to the Midvale company and the Bethlehem company. It will put us completely in their power. Whenever the proposition comes for us to abandon the gun factory, I expect it to come from those who oppose this amendment. They will prevent the Government from protecting itself, and then abandon the work because the Government can not protect itself.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question? I want to vote intelligently on his amendment. I understand the amendment carries an addition or increase for an iron and brass foundry and has nothing to do whatever with the forgings of steel. Now, how would the Government be relieved in its situation in regard to steel forgings for guns by an addition to an iron and brass foundry? That is what I want to know.

Mr. GREGG. It will at least be the beginning of an enlargement and improvement which will enable us eventually to resist this robbery all along the line.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Now, let me ask the gentleman a question. As a matter of fact, is not this the situation, that he recommends a certain addition of the iron foundry, based upon the proposition that we are to spend three or four million dollars for an addition to the gun factory, but that if the addition to the gun factory is not made, does it not necessarily follow that the iron foundry is not necessary?

Mr. GREGG. No; this amendment proposes to appropriate $300,000 for an enlargement of the gun factory, and this is essential, regardless of whether we adopt the general plan of enlarging the Washington Navy-Yard, and in support of this I want to read what Captain Leutze said in answer to a question asked him by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY].

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to ask you as to whether or not the building of this new foundry is necessary if the committee does not proceed with the general plan, the $3,000,000 plan—that is, if this committee does not adopt that general plan.

Captain LEUTZE. I do consider it necessary, leaving out everything else, and I have recommended nothing else personally for this year.

The questions asked by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] can have but one object, and that is to show that the work being done at the gun factory costs more than we can have it done for by contract, and thereby lay a predicate for the abandonment of this Government work. He tries to make it appear that I favor paying more for a gun to be made at the factory than it can be bought for, but unfortunately the position of the gentleman is too narrow to be of any weight. He singles out only the 12-inch guns. The finishing of these 12-inch guns is but a small part of the work done there. A great many other kinds of guns are made there, and also a great quantity of other ordnance is made there.

On page 1151 of the committee hearings, Captain Leutze gives a statement showing the comparative cost of guns and mounts, made at the National Gun Factory, and the same guns and mounts bought by contract, which includes the 12-inch gun, which costs us an amount all out of proportion because of the exorbitant price for the forgings. This statement is as follows:

Comparative cost of guns and mounts building at the Naval Gun Factory and by contract.

Type.	Name of contractor.	Contract price.	Naval Gun Factory price.
12-inch guns	Bethlehem Steel Co	$51,644.80	$61,770.61
12-inch mounts	do	[a] 59,881.50	49,342.22
10-inch guns	do	43,800.00	37,015.80
8-inch guns	Midvale Steel Co	17,142.00	23,619.13
Do	do	24,380.17	23,619.13

[a] This 12-inch mount is designed by the Bethlehem Steel Company, and is more expensive to manufacture than the service mount with which it is compared.

Comparative cost of guns and mounts building at the Naval Gun Factory and by contract—Continued.

Type.	Name of contractor.	Contract price.	Naval Gun Factory price.
8-inch guns	Midvale Steel Co	$22,000.00	$23,619.13
8-inch mounts	do	14,417.17	12,156.13
Do	do	13,000.00	12,156.13
8-inch guns	Bethlehem Steel Co	19,988.00	22,511.25
7-inch guns	Midvale Steel Co	14,315.00	17,638.87
Do	Bethlehem Steel Co	18,590.00	17,638.87
7-inch mounts	do	8,545.00	8,477.13
6-inch guns	Midvale Steel Co	12,283.00	12,371.04
6-inch mounts	do	7,588.00	10,208.51
5-inch guns and mounts	Bethlehem Steel Co	10,600.00	12,610.59
4-inch guns and mounts	do	8,400.00	9,557.16

By this it is seen that the cost of some is cheaper when made at the gun factory, while others are cheaper when purchased by contract; but the total cost of all when purchased is $346,574.67, while the total cost of all when done at the gun factory is $354,311.67. We must consider the entire work done, and not pick out isolated pieces of work, and from this standpoint it is shown by this statement that the difference is insignificant, and if we could get the forgings for 12-inch guns at a reasonable price the whole would cost us less to make it than to buy it. I will here incorporate a statement showing the comparative cost of other ordnance made at the gun factory and the same ordnance bought by contract and the amounts saved by doing the work at the gun factory:

Those who oppose this amendment fail to give any credit to another fact, which is that all the expenses of designing, experimenting, developing, and changing a lot of guns and mounts is included in the Naval Gun Factory prices. "This is an expense that the contractor does not have to bear, as he receives the completed drawings, etc., of the guns and mounts and proceeds with the manufacture in accordance therewith. If changes are made, additional compensation, covering the cost of such changes, is allowed the constructor."

When the Government needs certain ordnance, it publishes calls for bids for a specific gun, according to certain specifications, and the private contractor who obtains such contract only has to make the desired gun or other article according to said specifications, which in fact is the construction of duplicate work purely and simply; but we must not lose sight of the fact that all experiments were made in the Washington Gun Factory in order to obtain the perfect original to which the specifications used and followed by private contractors referred, as well as all ideas are advanced and put into tangible objects for the advancement and perfection of the most modern ordnance known; while the cost is quite large, it is absolutely necessary, as private contractors will not experiment at their own proper cost and expense for the benefit of the Government; and it is not fair or just to include the cost of all models, ideas, tools, and experiments made and had in the Washington Gun Factory in the cost of the finished and most modern product turned out therein, and then hold that the Government would save money by purchasing ordnance from private contractors, while as a matter of undisputed fact the private contractors are furnished with models and tools to a large extent by the Government which are made in the Naval Gun Factory and added to the cost of building guns at said Government Naval Gun Factory.

Where would the private contractor get his specifications from for the building of ordnance were it not for the Naval Gun Factory at Washington? How would the Government know what class or kind of ordnance it desired, and its constituent parts if it only relied upon private contractors, who, up to date, have only made ordnance according to prescribed forms and specifications furnished by the Government, obtained from its gun factory? How would the many improvements and latest devices be obtained, as is being daily done at said Washington Gun Factory, if the Government depended upon private contractors to experiment at their cost and expense? Certainly private contractors, even though they should make experiments, would include the cost of such experiments in the charge for the finished product, which would increase largely the present cost for simply duplication of guns and accessories from models already made in the Washington Gun Factory.

And, further, they fail to consider the fact that the guns finished at the factory are better and more satisfactory than those made by contract, and I will incorporate right here what Captain Leutze says on this subject, in answer to questions asked him by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY.]

Mr. RIXEY. You were talking about finishing the guns, and I want to ask you, in your opinion, whether the guns which are finished by the Government are better than those which are finished by private concerns?

Captain LEUTZE. There is not the slightest doubt about that; they are better, the parts are interchangeable, they are better finished, and more satisfactory in every way. The officers and men afloat prefer them.

Mr. RIXEY. You would not recommend that the Government should not finish its own guns?

Captain LEUTZE. I think it would be fatal if we stopped it.

I want also to state that many articles and ordnance made by these private contractors (to whom some of the Members of this House seem to wish to turn over all of our work) are received at the Naval Gun Factory in a state of imperfection, and have to be perfected at the gun factory. I will call special attention to the following cases which have been furnished me, to wit:

Continuously during several months prior to March of this year many 3-inch guns were received from the British-American Company in imperfect and defective condition, and had to be remedied and perfected at the gun factory. During the first days of March of this year there was received from the Midvale Steel Company one 8-inch gun, No. 149, with defective breech mechanism, which had to be perfected at the gun factory. The following gun mounts and accessories, recently received from the Bethlehem Company, had to be overhauled and made interchangeable at the gun factory, to wit: Twenty 5-inch Mark IX mounts, Nos. 262 to 281, inclusive; six 6-inch Mark VII mounts, Nos. 267, 268, 269, 280, 281, and 285. It cost the Government approximately $1,200 each to remedy the defects in said twenty-six mounts, making a total of $31,200. There was recently received from the Midvale Steel Company the following defective ordnance, to wit: One 8-inch slide, Mark XII mount, No. 178; one 8-inch gun, No. 151, with defective breech mechanism.

It is no wonder that Captain Leutze says that the ordnance made at our factory is better and more satisfactory to the men on the ships, the men who use them, than the ordnance bought by contract.

In this gun factory we have a body of the most skilled mechanics in the world, and if you will give them the facilities, they will do just as fine work and just as cheap work as can be done anywhere.

The cost of the enlarged gun factory proposed by this amendment is $300,000. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] in his remarks showed that its erection would save to the Government annually about $60,000 on the two items of labor saved in handling the material, and the amount saved in using steel castings instead of bronze castings—which are now used because there are no facilities for making the steel. This is 20 per cent on the investment. What good business man would not make it? It was shown at the hearings that 948 men are worked on the night shift; that it is necessary to have a night shift, because the factory is not large enough to work all the men on a day shift; that the efficiency and output of the night shift is only about 75 per cent of the same men working on a day shift; that the men on the night shift receive the same wages as those on the day shift; so here is a loss of 25 per cent on the wages of these 948 men; add this to the $60,000 saved on the other two items, and you will have a saving which seems to me ought to induce any man who has the interest of the Government at heart to vote for this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Those for the amendment have ten minutes remaining, and those opposed to the amendment have fourteen minutes remaining.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I would like to answer my own question, if the gentleman will pardon me about a minute and a half.

Mr. GREGG. My time has expired.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. We will surrender a minute and a half to the gentleman.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I asked a question as to whether these two were not inseparable and one dependent on the other, and I find from the statement of the gentleman himself that that is the case, and that he states emphatically:

It is realized in all probability such a large appropriation can not be obtained this coming fiscal year, and therefore this amendment simply anticipates the appropriation of three or four million dollars with which is necessarily involved—

And which the Members of the House should understand must necessarily come if we make this appropriation, or else we have got the whole plan out of joint. But in the statements before the Naval Committee it is said we have got to have a proposition of three or four million dollars before we begin this expenditure.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Following what the gentleman has said, I understood the statement was made before the Naval Affairs Committee, by some one who pretended to know what he was saying, that this plant would ultimately cost $4,000,000, whereas it is estimated by some of us who have had ten years of experience in making appropriations on such subjects that it will cost $6,000,000 by the time it is completed.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to know if the gentleman who has just arisen is for or against the amendment?

Mr. DAWSON. I intend to speak for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DAWSON] is recognized for the amendment.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I feel some embarrassment in favoring a proposition which has not met the recommendation of the Naval Committee, of which I am a member. But I desire to say that my position has been determined upon evidence which has come to me since the matter was considered by the Naval Committee—evidence which was not submitted to the Naval Committee when the matter was under consideration, and evidence of a character which, I think, this House wants to hear.

Now, I agree with my friend from Ohio [Mr. THOMAS] that what we want is the testimony of disinterested witnesses upon this proposition. There has been criticism here to-day about the testimony of the men who have charge of that foundry. There have been criticisms, by inference, of the men who desire contracts under the Government. The testimony which I have is the testimony of a disinterested witness. Secretary Morton, when he was Secretary of the Navy, desired to modernize and bring the Washington Gun Factory up to date. In order to have information upon which to base such action, he sent for a disinterested expert in the manufacture of steel. I have here the report of this gentleman, Mr. S. T. Nelson, and I want to call attention to one or two points in it.

I will say that this gentleman took up each shop and division of the Washington Gun Factory and discussed it in detail. In speaking of the foundry he said:

There are 186 men employed, working one shift only. For the number of men employed, the supervisory force (one master mechanic, one quarterman, and one leading man) is entirely too small for so great a variety of work.

This foundry is altogether inadequate. It is the poorest-looking shop in the yard, and is not at all in keeping with the rest of the naval gun factories. It could not even be considered a good job foundry. In this small foundry they are trying to make brass castings, bronze castings, iron castings, and steel castings, and it would be just about the proper size for the brass work alone, to say nothing of the space occupied by other work.

Now, one of the greatest necessities for this foundry lies in the fact that it requires such a long period of time to secure castings, not only in the first instance, but to secure the replacing of castings which have been condemned by the inspector. In that connection, Mr. Nelson says:

Regarding placing orders for these castings outside, I have the same comments to make as about placing the orders for forgings outside of the blacksmith shop. It is the time lost in waiting for these orders to be filled that is the greatest objection. There is, however, so much competition in iron castings that low prices per pound could probably be had from outsiders, but the difference would be more than equalized by the time lost in waiting for orders to be contracted for, let, and filled; so while there might be an apparent gain in the price per pound, the time lost in the machine shop waiting for material would more than offset the difference. Besides, the Department wants castings from various mixtures, which it would be difficult to get from job foundries.

Now, I will turn to what he says about forgings, and show this House what sort of process is necessary to get these castings in the first place, and get the replacements of the castings after they have been condemned by the inspectors.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman say who this party is—is he an officer of the Navy?

Mr. DAWSON. No; he is not. He is Mr. S. T. Nelson, the man selected by Secretary Morton as the best man to go there and examine that plant from the standard of a business man, and recommend to Secretary Morton how it could be modernized.

Mr. YOUNG. Had he been engaged in the manufacture of iron and steel?

Mr. DAWSON. I do not know; but I think he had.

Mr. YOUNG. Where was he from?

Mr. DAWSON. From Chicago. Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the process necessary to go through in order to replace the castings which have been condemned by the inspector.

Mr. VREELAND. May I ask the gentleman, is this testimony any better than that of his colleague [Mr. THOMAS] who is also practically engaged in the business, and other Members?

Mr. DAWSON. I do not understand that my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] spent several weeks' time in this examination as Mr. Nelson did, or that he has gone through the manufactory of the Washington Gun Factory with a stenographer at his elbow taking down the criticisms here and there, and setting it all down in an official report.

Mr. VREELAND. He did not cover only the foundry?

Mr. DAWSON. No; he covers the whole plant. Let me give the House the details of how long it takes the Department to get an outside order filled. Mr. Nelson says in his report:

FORGE SHOP.

The greatest trouble at the present time is the slow filling of orders. The Department takes so long in first advertising for bids, then letting the contract, and then getting the forgings; during all this time the other parts of the guns, or whatever it may be, are lying around the shops taking up valuable room, while they are waiting for the forgings to come in from outside forges. When the forgings do come in, and are found to be defective, the inspector condemns them; this in turn must be reported to the superintendent; the superintendent reports this to a board that condemns them officially; then it is referred to the purchasing department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended five minutes. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DAWSON. As Mr. Nelson says in his report:

Then it is referred to the purchasing department, and from there to where the forgings are made; so you can readily see the ridiculous loss of time in such cases. When they make their own forgings they can get them when they want them and as they want them. If a forging is condemned by the inspector, the forge department is immediately notified and another made in its place, and the work that the forging is a part of can go along and become finished, whereas if it is bought outside everything has to lie around and wait for the round-about way of getting it in the first place—getting it officially condemned, as they call it—and then replaced by the concern that made it. The replace orders get very scanty attention from all concerns, especially in busy times, and especially so with the Government, where there is no one in particular to keep prodding at them all the time to fill these orders.

Even if it costs as much to make the forgings in the Government shops as it costs to buy them outside, all the time would be saved that is now lost in waiting for orders to be filled and the work of which these forgings are a part could be completed and gotten out of the way.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him about the other point?

Mr. DAWSON. Just a moment; after I get through with this.

Speaking of the brass and steel castings which this increase is proposed to provide for, he says:

BRASS CASTINGS.

The brass castings they make in this department are very excellent, and the various mixtures for brass and bronzes are determined by the Department. I have found by experience that it is well-nigh impossible to get the job foundries to give you brass and bronze as you want it, and there is opportunity for dishonest work in connection with these mixtures that some people do not hesitate to resort to in order to make it pay; and it is well-nigh impossible to check them up on it, because it would be practically impossible to analyze all the mixtures and determine by this means whether they have given us the proportions asked for in the various pieces. The kind of brass and bronze castings, especially manganese bronze castings used in the naval gun factories, must be made exactly as determined by the Ordnance Department, as it would not do to take any chances on these mixtures for fear a part or parts might break on account of defective material at a critical moment, when a gun was in action and needed very badly; the probabilities that a defective piece would be the means of disabling the gun until repairs could be effected.

STEEL CASTINGS.

They are at present using a small converter for making their own steel castings, and as has already been mentioned in connection with iron castings there is so much competition in steel castings that as far as what the first cost of these castings is concerned, they could be made in outside foundries just as well as not. But here we are again confronted with the time and money losing delays in getting orders filled. When times are good in the country these steel foundries are filled up to overflowing, and it is almost impossible to get early deliveries, and all small manufacturers are constantly after these concerns to fill their orders. The consequences are that the Government has to wait. Then we are again confronted with the time lost in connection with the lengthy process of condemning castings.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Do you charge up against the manufacture of these forgings the cost of the delay of the Government officials in their examining and condemning them?

Mr. DAWSON. I am not speaking of the price; I am simply detailing the process.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I am speaking of the delay. You spoke of that.

Mr. DAWSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, he says.

In order to get replaces promptly, is one of the greatest arguments in favor of increasing the steel plant and making a greater number of steel castings than it now makes. When a steel casting is condemned it has to go through the same routine as mentioned in connection with the condemning of forgings, and it will require from six to ten weeks to get a defective steel casting replaced which, if made in your own shops, could be replaced in the length of time that is required to mold it and anneal it, which is about two weeks or less; so that, for the sake of prompt deliveries and prompt replacing of condemned castings, this steel plant ought to be increased to several times its present size——

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DAWSON. In just a moment. I wish to finish the reading of this:

as the receipt of material without delay, and the early replacing of condemned castings will be the means of getting the work completed that they are intended for, and the work can be gotten out of the shops and out of the way; whereas it is now piled up so that some of the shops resemble storehouses more than workshops.

Mr. VREELAND. Bearing on the point about which the gentleman has been reading, in which he speaks of the delay caused by purchasing these castings abroad, I would ask him if he would not give the committee something found on pages 77 and 78 of this same gentleman's report, in which he speaks of the gun factory making 92 top carriages, 105 slides, 43 elevating arms, and 20 brackets, which were finally condemned and thrown aside because the plans made by the gun factory itself were found to be defective.

Mr. DAWSON. No; the gentleman does not exactly state the proposition. Mr. Nelson, in his report, does condemn that particular piece of business, but he condemns the Ordnance Department of the Navy for placing such a large order before it is thoroughly decided that the design is going to be satisfactory.

Mr. YOUNG. It was a question of naval management, then?

Mr. DAWSON. In the Ordnance Department, and not in the gun factory itself. They simply manufacture down there what they are ordered by the Ordnance Department to manufacture.

Mr. VREELAND. I think the gentleman will find, if he reads it, that they are condemned for making 200 top carriages, slides, elevating arms, and training brackets, and putting the work on them before they found they were defective.

Mr. DAWSON. Yes; but the criticism is directed at the Ordnance Department of the Navy, which placed the order, and not at the gun factory, which simply executed the order.

Mr. VREELAND. It costs just as much whether it is one department or the other.

Mr. DAWSON. Yes; but we want the criticism to be placed where it belongs.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. What branch of the Government will this foundry be placed under if it is built?

Mr. DAWSON. It will be placed under the management of Captain Leutze.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Under the Ordnance Department of the Navy?

Mr. DAWSON. Under the same management that it is now.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Then the same state of affairs will continue?

Mr. DAWSON. The same thing would have happened if the Ordnance Department had placed the order with an outside contractor, and it did place the same kind of a defective order outside the factory, as the evidence will show.

Mr. VREELAND and Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut rose.

Mr. DAWSON. I have only a few minutes. I should like very much to yield to the gentleman, but I have not the time.

Mr. WACHTER. We will give you the time.

Mr. DAWSON. The time for closing the debate on this amendment has been fixed.

Mr. Chairman, a good deal has been said on this floor about the price of products of the Washington Gun Factory as compared with the prices in outside concerns. Now, this disinterested expert, who seems to know what he is talking about, has gone into this question with great thoroughness. He submits at the bottom of this report a comparison of what it costs to manufacture articles in the Washington Navy-Yard and the cost to get them by contract. And it should be borne in mind, as he says, that the Naval Gun Factory price as shown here includes 40 per cent in addition to the actual cost of labor and materials, and the cost of experimenting is also included. So I should judge that that was an eminently fair comparison. Now, for instance, here is a 1-pounder gun, rapid fire, with accessories; the contract price, $450; Naval Gun Factory price, $335.20. Here is a 1-pounder gun, Maxim-Nordenfeldt heavy automatic; contract price, $2,329.72; Naval Gun Factory price, $1,874.73. I will print in the RECORD a part of the comparison submitted in this report, as follows:

CONTRACT PRICE.	NAVAL GUN FACTORY PRICE.
$2,500. 6-pounder gun, semiautomatic, with mount, complete, from Driggs-Seabury Gun and Ammunition Company; 50 on contract of April 30, 1900.	$2,233.45. 6-pounder gun, Mark IX, model 1 (semiautomatic), complete, with Mark VII mount, manufactured on job order No. 4177, 1901. Price includes $400 royalty.
$1,137.52. 3-inch field gun and carriage made by American Ordnance Company. The cost is independent of the gun forgings, which were furnished by the Bureau of Ordnance.	$1,063.39. 3-inch field gun, Mark I, and carriage, manufactured on job orders No. 3358, 1895 and No. 3111, 1896. Price includes $90 royalty. The cost of forgings, $140.80, has been deducted.
$1,783.20. 3-inch 50-caliber gun, Mark II, with Mark II breech mechanism, from American Ordnance Company; 100 on Bureau of Ordnance requisition No. 144 of February 23, 1901.	$1,754.14. 3-inch 50-caliber gun, Mark II, using the cost of gun manufactured on job order No. 1539, 1900.
$4,333.33. 3-inch 50-caliber nickel-steel gun, mount and sight from American and British Manufacturing Company. Contract of April, 1905.	$4,129.05. Estimate based on 3-inch gun No. 280. Nickel-steel gun ..... $1,979.05 Mount, Mark IV ..... 1,200.00 Sight ..... 950.00 Total 4,129.05
$2,592.94. 4-inch 40-caliber gun, Mark VI, with Mark V breech mechanism, Nos. 145 to 164, from American Ordnance Company. Contract of November 28, 1896.	$2,522.72. 4-inch 40-caliber gun, Mark VI, with Fletcher breech mechanism, Mark V; average of 30 guns manufactured on job order No. 3080, 1897, serial Nos. 180 to 209. Price includes $100 royalty. The forgings on this lot of guns were considerably cheaper than on guns built later.
$1,573.14. 4-inch mounts, Mark IV, from American Ordnance Company.	$1,474.10. 4-inch mount, Mark IV-A. Averaged from No. 77, $1,688.73, invoiced March 19, 1897; No. 111, $1,271.57, invoiced April 19, 1897; No. 144, $1,462, invoiced August 31, 1897.
$5,500. 4-inch gun, Mark VII, with mount Mark VIII, model 1. Nos. 327 to 338, from Bethlehem Steel Company, contract February 28, 1903.	$5,454.28. 4-inch 50-caliber gun, Mark VII ..... $3,471.05 4-inch mount, Mark VIII, model 1 ..... 1,983.25 Total ..... 5,454.28 For gun, take average of 25 guns on job order, 1903-00. So it goes, from the top to the bottom. With only one or two exceptions, which are not material, these guns and other articles are manufactured in the Washington Gun Factory cheaper than they are purchased by contract. Now, let me go one step further.

Mr. VREELAND. I should like to ask the gentleman how he disposes of the figures, which I have presented here, showing the ordinary charges against the plant that would be made by the private manufacturer in reaching the total cost of the output?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAWSON. I should like to have time to answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may have time to answer the question.

Mr. DAWSON. I should like to have five minutes. Of course, if the House does not want to know the facts, I am perfectly willing to sit down.

Mr. VREELAND. It seems to me that we ought to have all of the facts instead of those facts which the gentleman from Iowa picks out for us. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Under the limitation put on the debate some time ago, debate in favor of the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. DAWSON. I want to add the amount that the iron and steel castings cost, as shown by this report:

Cost per pound of iron and steel castings and the prices quoted by outside manufacturers.

	Cost to make at naval gun factories.	Price quoted outside.
Iron	$0.03	$0.035 to $0.04
Steel	.05	.04 to .10

The CHAIRMAN. The question is——

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, has the time for debate on this amendment all been consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The time in favor of the amendment has all been consumed; there are ten minutes due the negative side.

[Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut addressed the committee. His remarks will appear hereafter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RIXEY) there were—ayes 33, nays 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Naval station, Key West, Fla.: Dredging and filling in, $15,000; to complete two officers' quarters, $1,200; marine railway, to complete, $5,000; in all, navy-yard, Key West, Fla., $21,200.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 30, line 19, after the word "in," strike out "fifteen" and insert "fifty;" in line 21, after the word "dollars," insert "commandant's quarters, $12,000; suspensory, $10,000; latrine, $3,000; grading and fencing, $10,000; sewer system, $3,000;" and in line 22 strike out "twenty-one" and insert "ninety-four."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment because I think it ought to be adopted. But before giving my reasons in detail for this opinion I desire to call the attention of the House, and incidentally that of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to what I conceive was an oversight on the part of that committee with reference to another matter, connected, however, with the subject-matter of this amendment.

Looking at the map of the Atlantic and the Gulf coast States, I notice quite a long stretch of seacoast from Charleston, S. C., around by Savannah, Fernandina, Jacksonville, Miami, Key West, and Tampa to Pensacola, a distance of about 1,200 or 1,300 miles, on which there is not a single dry dock or other facility for docking and repairing a battle ship or other naval craft in case of injury in battle or damage from any other cause, and no provision in this bill for the construction of such dry dock or any suggestion that this inadvertency or mistake will be remedied in the future, while on the coast north of Charleston, S. C., and up to Portsmouth, N. H., a distance of 700 or 800 miles, there are six of these places where dry docks are located, or one for about each 150 miles.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to criticise, and I do not intend to criticise, Congress or the Navy Department for establishing these dry docks. Indeed, I assume that they were necessary at the time they were established or they would not have been constructed. Nor would I say that they are not necessary now, that they are not being used, and will not be used in the future, but I do say that along this stretch from Charleston around the Florida coast, a distance, as I have said, of 1,200 or 1,300 miles, there should be in the interest of the Government at least one or more dry docks, especially on the southern coast of Florida. The necessity for these, I think, will be apparent to anyone who will give thought to the conditions there.

What are those conditions, Mr. Chairman? Florida projects far out into the southern seas, within 1,200 miles of the eastern terminus of what we have said shall be the Panama Canal, also within twenty-four hours' run of the Caribbean Sea, whose waters wash a part of the eastern shores of Central and South America. She has the Gulf of Mexico on one side, the Atlantic Ocean on the other, and the Gulf Stream—that most remarkable of all ocean currents—along her southern shores, beyond which lie the island of Cuba and her kindred group of islands known as the West Indies, extending in a semicircle all the way down to South America and inclosing from the eastward, so to speak, the Caribbean Sea, with the exception of large and deep channels or passages running between these islands, and thus connecting it with the Atlantic Ocean; the whole presenting an aggregation of conditions which places Florida and her southern ports in a position of transcendent importance to the United States from the standpoint of commerce and naval strategy.

Into and through the Gulf of Mexico the exports and imports to and from the Gulf States and States tributary thereto must pass, while through the channels leading into the Caribbean Sea the commerce of South and Central America must likewise go, soon to be augmented, we hope, by the completion of the Panama Canal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for ten minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not so much by shore batteries or standing armies as by battle ships and armed cruisers patrolling the straits of Florida and the passages into the Caribbean Sea that this vast commerce must be protected on our part in case of war with any European country, and we should be prepared with both ships and all that goes to make an efficient navy to furnish that protection if we would keep abreast of the progress of the world.

It is there also that we must protect, if it should ever be attacked, the Monroe doctrine. And who can say it will not be attacked? Continually new applications of it are being made. Under it we are to maintain, as against monarchial governments, the South and Central American republics, and almost at any time we may be called upon to uphold this self-imposed duty and defend one or more of these republics against the greed of some European country, and should the occasion arise we will meet it with every resource at our command.

This doctrine has obtained now for nearly a hundred years, and whatever mistakes, if any, have been made in its application, whatever strain we may have put upon it in our efforts toward territorial aggrandizement or otherwise, its principles are, perhaps, as dear to our people to-day as they ever were during any period of our glorious history. Indeed, I know of nothing except our own homes and firesides, our institutions, our rights and liberties for which we would lay down our lives more readily than for this doctrine, proclaimed by an American President even when we were weak among the nations of the world; and should it be assailed to-day 80,000,000 of Americans would rise up in its defense.

But again, where and how would it be defended? Not, perhaps, on American soil, but mainly in the waters and in the section just mentioned. To the westward and the southward of the Caribbean Sea would lie the object of attack, while our Gulf commerce and that of the Caribbean Sea would, if undefended, fall an easy prey to an enemy with a stronger navy. Hence the importance of these waters in a strategic sense, and hence the necessity for every facility at these far southern ports for the repairing and supplying of the ships of our Navy that must constantly assemble in and patrol these waters.

The Navy Department now for a greater part of the year, even in times of peace, keeps a large fleet in these waters. Almost every winter one is sent thither for the purpose of maneuvering, practicing, and otherwise familiarizing the officers and men with the scenes where their services may be needed, where naval battles may be fought in the future. So that navy-yards and dry-dock facilities are as greatly needed there as anywhere else along the thousands of miles of our immense seacoast.

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, a vessel should be injured in the Straits of Florida or in the southern part of the Gulf of Mexico, where would she go for her repairs if necessary for her to go into a dry dock? Either to Charleston or Norfolk, six or eight hundred miles up the Atlantic, or to Pensacola, on the Gulf, or, rather, I should say, to New Orleans, six or seven hundred miles, as the Pensacola dry dock, 550 miles from Key West, is, unfortunately it appears, not sufficiently large to accommodate the great battle ships of our Navy. In fact, I am told that the New Orleans dry dock is the only one in the Southern States that can accommodate a first-class battle ship. True it is that the Government—at least so I am informed—is constructing a dry dock at Guantanamo, its naval station on the southern coast of Cuba, but this, when completed, will be as far from the Straits of Florida and the southern part of the Gulf as Charleston and New Orleans. So the situation will be only partly relieved by the construction of a dry dock at Guantanamo.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to send a damaged vessel so far for repairs would entail great loss of time and money. Besides, in time of war such a course might invite disaster, as it would not be safe at all times to send a wounded ship alone over such a distance. In fact, such conditions might easily arise in case of disaster to our fleet. Of course we do not expect disaster. We have not, be it said to the honor of our Navy, been defeated many times in battle upon the sea, and we all indulge the hope and cherish the belief that it may never happen again. But it is well to be prepared, and we can not too soon construct a dry dock in one or both of the harbors of Key West and Tampa, each of which is among the finest in the world. Admiral Endicott, in his testimony before the House Committee on Naval Affairs early this year, said that there should be three or four dry docks on the Gulf of Mexico.

The following important statement is to be found on page 567 of these hearings:

Admiral ENDICOTT. * * * I think the Government ought to have three or four first-class dry docks on the Gulf of Mexico. There is only one dock on the waters of the Gulf or on the waters tributary to it, and that is the one at New Orleans. There is not a dock at Pensacola to-day that will take anything over 10,000 tons—that is, a floating dry dock. I think when the dock at Charleston is completed there will not be anything south of that which will take any battle ship except the New Orleans dock. There is a long stretch of coast that has no facilities for docking a battle ship.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on the Atlantic, north of Charleston, these dry docks are placed on an average of about 150 miles apart. Tampa and Key West are more than 200 miles apart, so that one Government dry dock at each place, in addition to the one at Pensacola, could properly be constructed, while the meager facilities at Pensacola should be augmented by the construction of a graving dock there.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the committee ought even here and now to remedy the mistake to which I have called attention, for mistake it is, not to give us the dry-dock facilities recommended by Admiral Endicott in those southern waters. But I would have but little hope at present of inducing the Naval Committee to accept an amendment, if I should offer one, entailing such an expenditure as would be requisite for the construction of even one of these docks. So I shall for the present let the matter rest, with the hope that this able committee may see its way clear at the next session of Congress to remedy these mistakes.

I now come to the amendment which I have offered, and in connection with what I may say regarding it I wish to read from the hearings had before the Committee on Naval Affairs the statement of Admiral Endicott, or a part of it, upon the importance of having navy-yards and dry docks at the places mentioned. I ought to say, Mr. Chairman, that my amendment does not embrace all the recommendations of the Navy Department, and I have included only those which Admiral Endicott said at the hearings ought to go into this bill, and which have been left out by the committee, whether wisely or unwisely it will be for the House to say. The entire amount of these recommendations was upward of $200,000, but these were reduced by him at the hearings to the items and figures as they appear in the amendment, these items being considered by him as more urgent.

There is a navy-yard at Key West, but not a dry dock. That navy-yard there, Mr. Chairman, has cost a good deal of money. I see that Admiral Endicott fixes its value at upward of $900,000. But it is, perhaps, including the land and the improvements there, of more value than the amount of money it originally cost.

Mr. RIXEY. How far is it from Pensacola?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is about 550 miles, as I recollect now. I now read from the testimony of Admiral Endicott, to show the importance of this naval station at Key West. The importance of navy-yards and the alleged practice of diverting work that it was claimed should be done at one navy-yard to another was under consideration when the following colloquy between the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LILLEY] and Admiral Endicott occurred:

Mr. LILLEY. It may indicate that we have too many navy-yards. Do you not thing that if we were a private enterprise instead of a great Government we would concentrate more and spend that money in large navy-yards and put it all into one and make one first-class establishment on each coast?

Admiral ENDICOTT. I think a private establishment would do that, because it is much more economical; but in a military establishment it is a great convenience, and very important frequently, to have naval stations at different points along your coast. In case of a war which involved very active operations in the Caribbean Sea, for instance, or in South America, it would be very important to have good, efficient naval stations on the nearest coasts. It would save a great deal of time and money.

And Key West, Mr. Chairman, and the southern portion of Florida is near this territory.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I also asked Admiral Endicott—I do not see it in the hearings here, but I recollect very distinctly I asked the question—whether or not he thought it would not be better to abolish two stations on the Gulf and make one first-class yard either at Key West, Pensacola, or New Orleans, and he said he thought it would. I asked him where that first-class yard ought to be established, and he stated at Pensacola.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Well, I have not come across that yet.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does that suit you?

Mr. SPARKMAN. But I am under the impression that before I get through, if the committee will indulge me till I finish the statement of Admiral Endicott on that point—it is not very lengthy—it will be seen that the admiral did not speak advisedly when he made that answer, because he says something else different, I think, from that statement to which the gentleman has just called attention. Perhaps the statement to which the gentleman refers is what immediately follows. I will read it:

Mr. LILLEY. I notice that we have navy-yards at Portsmouth, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Charleston, Key West, Pensacola, Norfolk, and that there are large appropriations for them all. Would not the work be done more economically if there were, say, not over half as many yards on the Atlantic coast?

Admiral ENDICOTT. It might be done more economically from the standpoint of peace entirely; but I think it is good policy to make a few of the yards larger.

Mr. LILLEY. That was my idea on that.

Admiral ENDICOTT. Some of these yards are second and third class yards. They are small establishments, and the regular current expenses are small.

The repairing of ships at navy-yards keeps the plants in better condition for the heavy strain on them in case of emergency—in case of war. If you did your repairing outside, as well as your building, the yards would run down.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I really would like to have sufficient time to finish reading what I desire to read here from Admiral Endicott's statement, which is only a page or two.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may finish his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am not accustomed to taking up the time of the House unnecessarily and I shall only detain it a few minutes longer. On page 544 of the hearings, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] asked a question in regard to grouping dry docks at one point, the answer to which is as much an argument in favor of a well-equipped navy-yard as a dry dock; hence I read it:

Mr. ROBERTS. In regard to grouping them at one point.

Admiral ENDICOTT. Well, there ought to be enough dry docks at an important navy-yard to admit of taking out a squadron and cleaning and painting their bottoms immediately. There ought to be several dry docks at a point like New York or Boston or Norfolk or Mare Island, for instance. I think each one of those yards ought to have several dry docks. There are times when you can not disperse your squadron or fleet and send some vessels to Boston and some to New York and some to Norfolk, and so on, for docking. They may be in a harbor where they can not get out unless they go together. The English navy has twenty-one dry docks in the Portsmouth navy-yard alone.

I also read the following extracts from pages 566–569 of the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. Now we go to "Naval station, Key West, Fla.: Dredging and filling in, $50,000." We gave you $15,000 last year.

Admiral ENDICOTT. Yes.

Mr. MEYER. Admiral, is it intended to equip this as a complete navy-yard?

Admiral ENDICOTT. Oh, no. It was found during the Spanish war that it was a very important post, and there were very few facilities there. We had to go out and rent property outside of the Navy at that time.

So you see the admiral does regard Key West as a very important place.

Mr. BUTLER. Do you know how that place is defended at the present time?

Admiral ENDICOTT. The War Department has a fortification at Key West, and there is also a fort at Dry Tortugas.

The CHAIRMAN. This looks like building up a station here. You ask in all for over $200,000.

Admiral ENDICOTT. We have a large coaling station, and we have a steam-engineering building and a construction building.

Mr. MUDD. What do you construct?

Admiral ENDICOTT. Vessels go there for repair.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. How many vessels were there last year? Do you know?

Admiral ENDICOTT. I could not tell you.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. The record shows that year before last there were two vessels there, and they remained a total of eight days, the two of them.

Admiral ENDICOTT. During the Spanish war that was made a post and the fleet was there a long time under Admiral Remey.

And, as further information, I will say that for the past three years the record shows about two ships in each year went to Algiers, in the Mississippi River, for repairs.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Could not this all go out without any harm?

Admiral ENDICOTT. It ought not to; it is an important station.

Mr. MUDD. What is the purpose of this dredging—what is it needed for?

Admiral ENDICOTT. Filling the land up to the grade, and also to make a good depth of water in front.

Mr. MUDD. Isn't there just enough now along the front?

Admiral ENDICOTT. There is at the coal wharf.

Mr. LILLEY. Can you improve land cheaper than you can buy it?

Admiral ENDICOTT. We had the same land there, but it was too low.

Mr. MUDD. You have depth enough at the coal wharf. What other vessels will there be there?

Admiral ENDICOTT. There were numerous vessels there during the Spanish war, and they all laid out in the harbor, so the communication was by means of lighters and tugs.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, gentlemen, I don't know how you feel about this, but there is the commandant's quarters, the dispensary, the central heating plant, the grading and fencing, the marine railway, the foundry, and the steam engineering. Why not take it all out? It means a new navy-yard, in my judgment.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is now a navy-yard there, valued at nearly a million dollars, as we have seen.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I second that motion.

Mr. RIXEY. How far is that from Pensacola?

Admiral ENDICOTT. It must be over 300 miles.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is this the closest place you have to Panama—the closest station?

Admiral ENDICOTT. On our own territory.

The Admiral was then asked by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER] the following:

Will there not be an estimate here very soon for a dry dock there?

To which the Admiral answered:

There might be some time in the future, but not in my time.

The Admiral did not here do himself justice. He did not for the moment consider just how young he is. He will, I am sure, live long enough to see a dry dock there and to supervise and control it for many years, as he does so ably those now in his charge.

I think the Government ought to have three or four first-class dry docks on the Gulf of Mexico. There is only one dock on the waters of the Gulf or on the waters tributary to it, and that is the one at New Orleans. There is not a dock at Pensacola to-day that will take anything over 10,000 tons—that is, a floating dry dock. I think when the dock at Charleston is completed there will not be anything south of that which will take any battle ship except the New Orleans dock. There is a long stretch of coast that has no facilities for docking a battle ship.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I might read further, but I will not take up the time of the committee to do so. Enough has been read to show the importance of Key West as a naval station. I will repeat that the items embraced in this amendment are those recommended by Admiral Endicott in his report and in these hearings. The committee cut them down, but in my judgment they acted unwisely, and this amendment should go through as it has been submitted to the House.

Mr. Chairman, we need all these facilities in time of peace, but still more in time of war. And wars we will have in the future, as in the past. I am not so optimistic as some gentlemen here. I know the world is growing better day by day, that we are continually reaching higher ground in civilization's upward march, but we are not yet nearing that point in the upward trend of progress where nations, learning war no more, will "beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks." There is yet a great deal of the "old Adam" in man.

Cupidity and greed are not yet strangers to the human character, and the lust of power and desire for territorial aggrandizement are still potent, if not pernicious, features in the national life; and until these can be curbed or satiated we can not reach that point in national development when nations will seriously and effectually agree that peaceful arbitration shall take the place of the arbitrament of the sword. Until then we must be prepared to meet aggression with defensive methods, hostile encroachment by other nations with battle ships and armed battalions. Hence the necessity, I fear, yet a while for a strong navy among other defensive measures.

By this I do not mean a navy as strong as Great Britain's, for we will probably never have her as an antagonist. She is more likely to be our ally in any great armed conflict. But in any event it will be necessary to have a naval establishment proportionate, at least, to a degree, in strength to those of the more powerful nations, if for no other purpose than that of keeping the peace and enforcing the edicts of an international board of arbitration, if the nations are to have one.

So, Mr. Chairman, as we are to possess a navy, we should do whatever is necessary to keep it up to that degree of efficiency demanded by the exigencies of our position among the nations of the earth. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I would make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the requests of the gentlemen? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Mare Island, Cal.: Railroad system, extension, $5,000; electric-plant system, extension, $5,000; improvement of channel in Mare Island Strait, to complete, $100,000; sewer system, extensions, $3,000; paving and grading, to continue, $5,000; heating system, extension, $5,000; improvements to building No. 165, $4,000; improvements and repairs, steam engineering, buildings, $15,000; bridge between buildings 45 and 65, $1,000; in all, navy-yard, Mare Island, $143,000.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I will not detain the House but a moment. I wish to place in the RECORD letters from the War and Navy Departments, showing the success, up to this time, of the work now under way for the improvement of the channel leading to the Mare Island Navy-Yard. In view of the fact that a mistaken impression has prevailed in some quarters relative to the depth of water, my purpose in presenting these letters is to forever set at rest any such misapprehension. The facts are that the success of the project now being carried out, and which was proposed by the House Committee on Naval Affairs, is proving more successful even than anticipated.

These letters from the War and Navy Departments demonstrate beyond a question that the channel leading to the Mare Island Navy-Yard contains, at nearly every point, fully 30 feet of water at mean low tide, a depth sufficient to take any ship afloat.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD, in connection with his remarks, letters bearing upon the situation at the navy-yard, Mare Island, Cal. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 22, 1906.

DEAR SIR: Answering your letter of 5th instant, in which you ask to be advised as to the increase of depth in the channel to the Mare Island Navy-Yard, Cal., I beg to inform you that the local engineer officer, Colonel Heuer, to whom the matter was referred, reports under date of 13th instant, as follows:

"A channel, 30 feet deep at low tide and 300 bottom width, has been completed, by dredging, through San Pablo Bay, California. The depth prior to improvement was 19 feet at low water. The depth has therefore been increased by 11 feet.

"There is another channel in Mare Island Strait which is being improved under the direction of the Navy Department. Of the condition of the latter channel this office has no official information."

Very respectfully,

ROBERT SHAW OLIVER,
Assistant Secretary of War.

Hon. J. R. KNOWLAND,
House of Representatives.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 2, 1906.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 27th ultimo, requesting information as to the progress of work under the direction of the Navy Department on the channel in Mare Island Strait, I have the honor to inclose herewith, for your information, a copy of the latest report from the commandant, navy-yard, Mare Island, dated March 10, 1906, inclosing one from the civil engineer at that navy-yard, showing the results on the improvement of Mare Island Strait.

Very respectfully,

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. J. R. KNOWLAND, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

COMMANDANT'S OFFICE,
Navy-Yard, Mare Island, Cal., March 9, 1906.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a report submitted by the civil engineer in regard to the improvement in Mare Island Strait.

The commandant, from a personal examination of the channel, was led to believe that there was an increase in the shallowest part of 4 feet since the improvement to the channel began. This belief is corroborated, as shown by the report of Civil Engineer Rousseau, above mentioned, although there is considerable work yet to be done in the strait before the improvements are fully completed.

I desire to express the opinion that since the channel has been cut across San Pablo flats, giving 30 feet of water at mean low tide, there is no reason why the battle ship Oregon should not come to the navy-yard to discharge her ammunition, in case that ship comes to San Francisco for such a purpose.

In this connection, I beg to congratulate the Navy Department upon the success which has followed the inauguration of the improvements to increase the depth of water in Mare Island Strait. * * *

Very respectfully,

B. H. MCCALLA,
Rear-Admiral, U. S. Navy,
Commandant Navy-Yard and Station.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, D. C.
(Through the Bureau of Navigation.)

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Puget Sound, Washington: Sewer system, extensions, $3,000; to continue grading, $10,000; electric-light plant, extensions, $5,000; water system, extensions, $2,500; heating system, extensions,

$4,000; dredging, to continue, $10,000; roads and walks, extensions, $2,500; stone and concrete dry dock (to cost $1,250,000), $100,000; smithery for construction and repair, to complete, $4,000; in all, navy-yard, Puget Sound, Washington, $141,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 17 strike out "ten" and insert "thirty."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, in connection with this amendment I simply want to say a few words in reference to the matter of dredging at this yard. I think rather inadvertently a wrong impression was conveyed in the hearings by the testimony of Admiral Endicott, although, if you read all of his testimony, it makes it perfectly plain. It seems that when questioned by the committee he stated that they would need at this yard for dredging the next few years something like a hundred thousand dollars, and other remarks were made which seemed to convey the impression to some of the members of the committee that a large sum of money would be required for dredging. My friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] stated in the committee:

I am disappointed to learn of the enormous amount of dredging that is in prospect to enable us to get our ships up to the wharves there to handle them as we expect to handle them in a navy-yard. I was informed by a member of this committee that this was the most desirable place for a navy-yard in the United States on account of the great depth of water and the possibility of bringing the ship up close to the shore.

In answer to that Admiral Endicott made the proper statement:

That is true so far as getting the ship in there is concerned; it is a fine harbor, a fine channel; and the ships in the Navy could lie in there any day. But we must fill out or build piers out to this deep water, and that is true in all of the yards.

In another part of his testimony Admiral Endicott gives the impression they may have to dredge out quite a long distance from the shore in order to reach deep water. As a matter of fact, all of the dredging that has been necessary at Puget Sound Navy-Yard, and all the dredging that will be necessary at the yard in the future, is simply the dredging near the shore or along the wharves or piers in order to make proper docking facilities. Of course this would be expected at any location, I think, you would find anywhere in the country, and this is so stated by Admiral Endicott. I do not think that you can find any harbor where vessels can go right up to the shore and find dockage facilities made there by nature, and we have never claimed for the Puget Sound Navy-Yard that vessels can come up there and tie up to stumps or trees on the shore line. It is to the advantage of the yard that the deep water does not go up so close to the shore, because it would make the construction of wharves and the building of piers much more expensive than it is now. As a matter of fact, all of the dredging that ever has been or ever will be necessary at this yard is simply done for the purpose of deepening the channel along the wharves or piers and for berthing purposes.

By building these wharves and piers out a distance of four or five hundred feet you come to water 30 to 33 feet deep. If the water were as deep as that up to the shore line it would make the construction of the wharves and piers much more expensive. It seems to me it is really an advantage in the running of wharves out something like four or five hundred feet and getting 33 feet of water, and then dredge along the side of the wharf, and get plenty of berthing room and docking room for the vessel. Of course if you were to build the wharves and piers out to deep water, and then extend them in opposite directions, no dredging at all would be necessary. It is better, however, and cheaper to build the docks and piers out as far as is desired and then dredge alongside, making dockage facilities.

The amount of money expended in this way for dredging, as given by Admiral Endicott, is $40,000; and I have a letter from the Secretary of the Navy stating how this money has been expended—that is, the manner of and purpose of the dredging—and I desire to call the attention of the committee to these facts. The appropriations made were, $20,000 on March 4, 1898; $10,000, April 27, 1904, and $10,000, March 3, 1905. One thousand cubic yards of material were removed from the channel south and in the immediate vicinity of the masonry entrance to the dry dock. Work was commenced December 8, 1902, and finished December 13, 1902, at a total cost of $1,150.

That was an expenditure right at or near the mouth of the dock simply to make the entrance much more easy; and I want to call the attention of the committee to this fact, that when the dredging is done once at this yard it does not have to be done again. There is no filling up. There is no sediment carried in the waters of that harbor, and therefore no deposit after the channel is made.

Second, a berthing site for the United States receiving ship Philadelphia, 400 feet long and 100 feet wide, was dredged outside of the southerly end of wharf. Work was begun March 15 and completed March 21, 1904, at a total cost of $3,600.

Now, we do not claim that there are natural berthing sites there for vessels. Some little preparation has to be made here, as at any other yard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In connection with the contract for the construction of the coaling plant and wharf, an area on each side of the wharf, measuring 100 feet wide by 450 feet long, was dredged to a depth of 30 feet during December, 1902, and February, March, and April, 1903, at a cost of $11,000.

That shows that on completing the plant, the coal plant and wharf, a channel was dredged alongside, and this furnishes splendid facilities for coaling and unloading vessels.

Then, under a contract dated August 14, 1905, 61,196 cubic yards of material were dredged from the site of a new pier.

Now, that shows the character of dredging that is necessary at this yard and the character of dredging that will be necessary in the future. There is no dredging necessary for the channel; no trouble about bringing vessels into the yard. The greatest vessels that will ever be built can come to this yard under their own steam without any danger of grounding. What other yard in the country can be reached in this way? No dredging will be required for an anchorage basin. The navies of the world can lie at anchor there just as it is now. Simply for the purpose of comparison, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the report of the Navy Department showing the amount of money expended at the different navy-yards for dredging. At Boston, $115,000; at League Island, $855,000; Mare Island, $420,000; New York, $155,000; Norfolk, $45,000; Pensacola, $75,000; Port Royal, $256.000; Portsmouth, $774,000, and Puget Sound, $40,000.

I assume that this does not take into account anything expended under the river and harbor appropriations for the dredging out of channels in order that vessels may get up to the different yards, which in many cases has been very large. So that I take it, gentlemen, there is no site in the country better located in connection with deep water or with better channel approach or better anchorage basin than this navy-yard—in fact, I know of none that will compare with the navy-yard at Puget Sound in these respects. I am glad to see that the committee has incorporated in this bill a provision for a dry dock at this yard. It is certainly very much needed. I had the pleasure of calling the attention of the committee to this improvement when the last bill was being considered, and I am much pleased that the committee has so fully appreciated the great necessity of having an additional dock as to incorporate a provision for it in this bill. As Admiral Endicott says in his testimony, it is the only yard with a dock on the Pacific where a battle ship has ever been docked or could be docked up to the present time, and the necessity for a new and additional dock is very great.

The committee have cut the appropriation for dredging down from $30,000 to $10,000. I believe the committee has done the best it could do, and in view of the fact that no large improvements, aside from the dock, are provided for, I am inclined to think the sum provided for dredging is sufficient, and shall not press my amendment. Other improvements should be provided for. A floating crane is needed. A blacksmith shop for construction and repairs should be built. More piers are needed. These, with other improvements, were urged by Admiral Endicott and by us. The committee has not seen its way clear to make provision for these in this bill. It has provided for the most essential, the new dock, and I shall not further urge these additional appropriations at this time. The building up of this yard is not a local matter. It is of national concern, and as such I have no doubt the committee considered it in reaching its conclusions as to what should be done.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I only ask an opportunity to say a word. I am very sorry indeed that an explosion of mine should have invited the discussion that the gentleman has indulged in. I was surprised that any dredging was needed at this plant. Therefore I made the remark which he quoted. After the witness, the Chief of Yards and Docks, had made his explanation I was entirely satisfied. There is no place in the United States which offers the natural inducements for a navy-yard such as found at Bremerton, and I am greatly in its favor. I did not mean to complain, but praise.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am certainly delighted to think that my remarks should have called forth such an expression.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Pensacola, Fla.: Water system, $5,000; sewer system, $10,000; conduits and conductors for distribution of power, $5,000; crib for wooden floating dry dock, $20,000; in all, navy-yard, Pensacola, $140,000.

Mr. FOSS. I move to strike out the words "one hundred and." It is a clerical error.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, lines 3 and 4, strike out the words "one hundred and;" so that it will read "forty thousand."

Mr. FOSS. That is to correct the total.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval station, New Orleans, La.: Improvement of water front, $40,000; levee improvement and grading, $10,000; machinery and tools for yards and docks shop, $3,000; central electric light and power plant, to complete, $50,000; rebuilding cross wharf, $10,000; strengthening approaches to floating dock, $9,500; railroad system, $5,000; underground conduit system, $5,000; drainage system, $8,000; sawmill, boat shop, and storage for construction and repair, $60,000; toward the construction of street around naval station in lieu of Patterson street, $15,000; in all, navy-yard, New Orleans, $215,500.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, commencing with the word "toward," in line 15, down to and including "dollars," in line 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 32, in lines 15, 16, and 17, strike out the words "toward the construction of street around naval station in lieu of Patterson street, $15,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this appropriation of $15,000 to construct a street around a naval station can not be found in the estimates submitted to Congress. I have carefully examined the testimony of the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and I find no reference whatever to this item. In his testimony the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks says that the entire plant at New Orleans is valued at $1,091,000, $815,000 of which is invested in a dry dock. It is proposed here to put a $15,000 street around a navy-yard valued at $1,091,000, $815,000 of which is invested in a dry dock; and if I be not mistaken, it is a floating dry dock.

This paragraph is very instructive to anyone who will analyze its provisions. The total estimates for improvements under the Bureau of Yards and Docks at the navy-yard at New Orleans submitted to Congress this year amounted to $270,000. The committee has allowed $215,000. The total estimates for improvements at the New York Navy-Yard this year amounted to $380,000; the committee allowed $128,000. Last year $82,000 was appropriated for improvements at the navy-yard at New York, $95,000 for the navy-yard at New Orleans. Let me call attention to the significance of these figures. In the construction department at New York last year the maximum number of men employed was 3,355, the minimum, 2,786. The average in this one bureau alone was 3,049. Now, what would the committee suppose was the number of men employed at New Orleans?

Mr. MEYER. Does the gentleman mean that he is dissatisfied with the appropriation made for the New York Navy-Yard?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all. If I had been dissatisfied I should have offered amendments at that point; although my experience in the past convinced me that it is hopeless for me to offer amendments to obtain appropriations for improvements at that place. But that does not prevent me from letting the committee see one of the means by which money is squandered in this bill. I spoke of the number of men employed in one bureau at the navy-yard in New York. Let me state the figures with regard to the navy-yard at New Orleans. Only one bureau does any work there. That is the Bureau of Construction and Repair. The maximum number of men employed there last year was 110. The minimum number was 13. The average number, 39. And yet they submit here a recommendation for yard improvements to cost $215,000. More than that, minor repairs were made upon two vessels at that navy-yard. Let me contrast that with the navy-yard at New York, and I merely take the yard at New York because I am more familiar with what is done there. I am somewhat better acquainted with what is accomplished there than elsewhere. Five vessels are there under construction. Minor repairs were made upon forty-three, and what are called "important repairs," made on twenty-four vessels. These figures are not my own; they are taken from the official reports of the Navy Department. I understand that the navy-yard at New Orleans—if my information be not inaccurate—is from 15 to 40 feet below the levee. I am not sure of the exact figures. The probability is that some night the levee will break and everything invested there will be swept out into the Gulf.

Mr. Chairman, if I had an opportunity to determine how these other items might properly be cut down, I would offer amendments to reduce them. I respectfully submit that at least upon this showing the Committee on Naval Affairs will not ask this committee to appropriate $15,000 to build a street around this navy-yard, an item which is not found in the estimates submitted in the Book of Estimates, which was not mentioned by the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, so far as I can ascertain in his testimony, and which, in my judgment, is done not for the benefit of the navy-yard, but for the benefit of the city of New Orleans.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask that the gentleman's time may be extended for one minute. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so extended.

Mr. TAWNEY. Can you or any member of the committee inform the Committee of the Whole as to whether or not the Government owns the land on which this street is to be constructed around the navy-yard?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know.

Mr. FOSS. It is on navy-yard ground. I will say that we took a street which belongs to the city, that ran right straight through the navy-yard, in front of the dock; or, I will say, between the floating dock and the shops. We thought that it would be no more than fair to build a road around, inasmuch as we had taken the main street, the main artery of travel, away from the city.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the city of New York, in the Borough of Brooklyn, the Government has a navy-yard consisting of more than 118 acres. It has the fee of the sidewalk, at least of the street, and in all of the years that it has had that it has never even put down a pavement upon the part of the street that is used for foot passengers; and if the committee is going to recommend the building of streets and putting down pavements, the least it might do is to commence at a place where some use can be made of such things.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word. Of course, the committee provides for the navy-yards, and they need it. The New York Navy-Yard is the greatest yard in the United States, and in the years that are past we have spent in the neighborhood of $20,000,000——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken; I have the figures here.

Mr. FOSS (continuing). That is a first-class yard, of course, and in good condition. There is no necessity of making large appropriations for it all the time. The yard at New Orleans is a new yard; it was authorized by Congress a few years ago, and we are putting it in shape where we can do more work than was done during the last fiscal year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman state how much is expected to be spent there in order that it may do any appreciable amount of work?

Mr. FOSS. It is merely repair work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has been that since 1849.

Mr. FOSS. Oh, no; it's only during the last few years that we have got a small repair station there, and that is all we are going to have.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is evident from the fact that the average number of men employed there was thirty-nine last year.

Mr. FOSS. That shows plainly that the yard is not in a condition to do work, and therefore it needs more appropriations.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who seems to have constituted himself censor, or we might even say the scold, of the House, in his statement shows that, while he may sometimes have good information, he much more frequently has misinformation, as is evidenced by his remarks in this case. He should know the cause why so little work has been done at the New Orleans station arises from the incompleteness of the establishment. The largest steel floating dock in this country is located there, available for the docking of vessels. The station being new, the machine shops, construction and repair shop, and other necessary tools are not ready to operate, and the appropriations herein proposed will contribute to their completion and the efficiency of the yard. The comparison which the gentleman makes between the New York Navy-Yard and that at New Orleans must strike one familiar with the situation as almost absurd and ridiculous. The New York yard is the largest in this country—we may say, a completed station. It has been fostered for many years, and the statement of the gentleman regarding the amount appropriated for it shows conclusively that it does not need much more than it has already. The New Orleans yard is still in embryo. Since I have been a member of the Naval Committee the New York yard has received ample appropriations yearly, and the complaint which the gentleman makes that he has found it useless to seek additional ones is, I am sure, entirely unfounded.

Now, as to the provision for the street at the New Orleans yard. The gentleman complains that he finds no estimate for it in the general estimates. That is true, because at the time the estimates were submitted, some time between October and November last, it was not known how much would be required. In fact, it was supposed that a very moderate sum would be needed for the purpose. The street, I will take occasion to say, is on Government property, within the bounds of the navy-yard. In evidence that it has received consideration by the Department, I send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the Secretary of the Navy on that subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 8, 1906.

SIR: Referring to your request for the views of this Department regarding the appropriation of $15,000 embraced in the pending naval appropriation bill toward the construction and improvement of the street or streets in lieu of Patterson street at the naval station in New Orleans, La., you are advised that in view of the proposed cession by the city of New Orleans of Patterson street on the river front of said station, and its importance and value to the station and value to the public, it is deemed proper and just that the public should have a good street or streets in place thereof as an outlet.

The city engineer of New Orleans, after a careful examination, estimates the cost thereof to be $38,995.43. It is the opinion of the Department, based upon a personal inspection by the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, that the work might be done efficiently, although not as well, for a less amount. The sum of $15,000 proposed to be appropriated appears reasonable, and the Department recommends that this amount be appropriated accordingly.

Very respectfully,
TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. ADOLPH MEYER, M. C.,
Member Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives.

Mr. MEYER. In further explanation, Mr. Chairman, permit me to quote from a report made by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House in the Fifty-eighth Congress (Report No. 4091), which is similar to the report made by Mr. HALE, of the Senate:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18363) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to construct a good drained road at the naval station, New Orleans, La., report the same favorably with the recommendation that it do pass.

The following letter in commendation thereof is adopted as the committee's report:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 6, 1904.

SIR: The act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905 (32 Stats., 336), under the subheadings "Public works, Bureau of Docks and Yards, navy-yards and stations," etc., and "Naval station, New Orleans, La.," appropriates the sum of $2,000 for "closing Pattison [Patterson] street, Saux lane, and grading."

Patterson street runs along the water front of the Mississippi River between the United States naval station property, Algiers, La., and the levee. The maintenance of this street as a public highway being incompatible with the use of the station for naval purposes, the Department sought and has obtained a cession from the city authorities under which the street may be closed. In granting this cession, however, the city authorities have stipulated that a roadway be provided around the naval property, in order that a suitable thoroughfare for the accommodation of public traffic may be maintained.

This Department is advised by the Attorney-General that by the cession above mentioned the United States will obtain a valid title to the portions of the bed of Patterson street now lying between the naval reservation and the river "upon the performance of the conditions" set forth in the city ordinances making the cession.

Secretary of the Navy Charles J. Bonaparte, in a letter of April 3 last, also recommends the construction of this street on the lines indicated.

Patterson street runs along the water front of the Mississippi River, as has been stated, and the land is very valuable. The Government receives far more than it grants—in fact, it grants nothing at all, since the new street is within the boundaries of its station.

The gentleman from New York reflects upon the committee's manner of doing business. Nearly every one of them has equal regard for the interests of the Government and far wider experience than he. It ill becomes him to indulge in such criticism.

As to his comments on the value and condition of the New Orleans Station, that its location is 40 feet below the level of the water, and so on, I will in charity attribute it to his effort to be funny or sarcastic; in either case, a most lamentable failure.

I commend him to the history of the legislation for its establishment. If he reads it, he will issue from it "a wiser, if not a better man."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 9, noes 45.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Steel floating dry dock: Steel floating dry dock (to cost $1,250,000), $100,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRUMPACKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the naval appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 13946. An act for the relief of Charles L. Allen;

S. R. 54. Joint resolution authorizing a change in the weighing of the mails in the fourth section—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

JOHN W. HAMMOND.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying document, was ordered printed, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring) of May 9, 1906, I return herewith House bill No. 8948, entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to John W. Hammond."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 10, 1906.

REPRINT OF BILL.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the reprint of the bill H. R. 11943, the supply of which has been exhausted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the reprint of the bill be granted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that in the judgment of the Chair a bill can be reprinted only by unanimous consent or by interposition and on report of the Committee on Printing. The Chair does not say it can be done in that way, but it possibly can.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the request of Mr. BOWERSOCK for a leave of absence for ten days on account of important business.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the request be granted.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), on motion of Mr. Foss, the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock m.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 11, 1906.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SCOTT, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

CARRYING OF DANGEROUS ARTICLES ON PASSENGER STEAMERS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

Senate bill No. 5514 is returned herewith without approval, for the reasons set forth in the following report from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor:

"I have the honor to return herewith the bill (S. 5514) an act to amend section 4472 of the Revised Statutes relating to the carrying of dangerous articles on passenger steamers, and to state, in reply to the request contained in the letter of May 5, 1906, that the Department objects to the approval of the bill for the following reasons:

"The word 'passenger' in the bill should be 'passengers.' It passed the Senate 'passengers' and the House of Representatives 'passenger.' The mistake was not detected and the bill was enrolled and signed by the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate with the word 'passenger.' In the opinion of the Department the circumstances of the passage of the bill are sufficient to raise doubt as to its validity and question as to its application."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 10, 1906.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the message be referred to the Committee on Commerce and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. The Committee on Commerce was informed of the mistake made in enrolling the bill or in the House, and it authorized me to report this morning and ask present consideration of the following bill. It is important that it shall be passed immediately, owing to the fact that there are no yachts nowadays that do not carry launches propelled by naphtha or some like power, and the yachting season is about commencing. The ruling of the inspector-general in New York would deprive them of the privilege of using those launches. I report from the Committee on Commerce a bill to correct that mistake, which I ask may be now considered.

The bill (S. 6129) to amend section 4472 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the carrying of dangerous articles on passenger steamers was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4472 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following provision:

"Provided, however, That nothing in the provisions of this title shall prohibit the transportation by vessels not carrying passengers for hire of gasoline or any of the products of petroleum for use as a source of motive power for the motor boats or launches of such vessels."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks for the present consideration of the bill which has just been read.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FINDINGS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact filed by the court in the cause of the County Court of Ste. Genevieve County, Mo., v. The United States; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

S. 2296. An act restoring to the public domain certain lands in the State of Minnesota;

S. 4976. An act to grant certain land to the State of Minnesota to be used for the construction of a sanitarium for the treatment of consumptives;

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 6135) granting a pension to Mary E. Hughes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DILLINGHAM introduced a bill (S. 6136) granting a pension to Persis A. Gowen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BULKELEY introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 6137) granting an increase of pension to Fannie L. Pike;

A bill (S. 6138) granting an increase of pension to Eliza P. Norton;

A bill (S. 6139) granting an increase of pension to Eliza A. Brusie;

A bill (S. 6140) granting an increase of pension to Julia A. Birge;

A bill (S. 6141) granting an increase of pension to Ransom C. Russell;

A bill (S. 6142) granting an increase of pension to Frederick M. Hart;

A bill (S. 6143) granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Northrop;

A bill (S. 6144) granting an increase of pension to Henry Savage; and

A bill (S. 6145) granting an increase of pension to Enoch Bolles.

ESTATE OF CHARLES M. DEMAREST.

Mr. PLATT. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 6101) for the relief of the estate of Charles M. Demarest, deceased, which was reported unanimously by the Committee on Finance.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to the legal representatives of the estate of Charles M. Demarest, late of Warwick, in the State of New York, $122.26, being the amount due on one first-mortgage preferred bond issued by the Champaign, Havana and Western Railway Company, No. 251, and dated July 1, 1879, and paid into the United States Treasury on February 23, 1898, by the clerk of the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Illinois, in accordance with section 996, as amended by the act of February 19, 1897 (29 Stat. L., p. 578), which provides that money remaining in the registry of court unclaimed for ten years shall be deposited to the credit of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF IRRIGATION ACT TO STATE OF TEXAS.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14184) to extend the irrigation act to the State of Texas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a memorandum on the bill indicating that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] wishes to be present when the bill is considered.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Senator from Massachusetts is here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the bill may not be passed by unanimous consent. It seems to me to be a very important bill, and I wanted an opportunity to look at it and at the report before it is taken up. I have been so busy that I have not had an opportunity to do so. I hope it need not be pressed at this time. It seems to me to be a very large question.

Mr. BAILEY. No, Mr. President; it simply extends the law already existing to the arid regions of Texas; and Texas, like the people who go to mill, takes her place in the rear of all the others, to wait until all that has been provided for the others has been accomplished.

Mr. LODGE. Are there public lands of the United States in Texas?

Mr. BAILEY. Not an acre of public land belongs to the United States.

Mr. LODGE. That seems to me to be a very important point.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator understands that nothing is given to anybody, but that all who get the benefit of this act are compelled to return an equivalent to the Treasury. It seems to me that if the people of the arid regions of Texas return their equivalent to the Treasury they are entitled to just as much as the people of the arid regions of any other State or Territory.

Mr. LODGE. I agree with the Senator; I think they are; but my understanding of the legislation we have had hitherto was that the sale of public lands furnished the funds by which the work of irrigation was carried on.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true.

Mr. LODGE. Now, Texas has no public lands of the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true.

Mr. LODGE. Therefore, where are the funds coming from?

Mr. BAILEY. They will come from the same source that the funds used in other States come from; and like all the money furnished to any other State, it must be repaid into the Treasury.

I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts frankly that I did not sympathize with this original legislation, but it was entered upon by the Government, it has been prosecuted with great success in certain regions, and I do not believe that there can be any fair disposition to exclude from the provisions of the act any arid region in the Republic.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator from Texas allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to suggest that as I remember the law Texas will be practically on the same basis as the other States; that licenses will be given out; and the money received from that source is used to return the advances made by the Treasury for all of the irrigation purposes in various States. So if half a million or money or a million or five hundred millions is used in Texas there will be the same facility for returning it in Texas that there is in Idaho or Montana.

Mr. BAILEY. That is precisely true.

Mr. LODGE. That is the point I wanted to get at. The money is taken from the funds of lands in other States.

Mr. BAILEY. But the lands in the other States do not belong to the other States.

Mr. LODGE. No; they belong to the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. They belong to a common fund.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly—the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. They belong to the common fund of the people. In other words, they belong just as much to the State of Texas as they do to the State in which they are situated. I remember once, when a Member of the House, trying to grant those lands to the States in which they were situated, but I could not secure the favorable consideration for that proposition.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Is this a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. BAILEY. It is.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I dislike to object, but I want to make a further examination of the bill and perhaps, at another time, offer some amendments to it, if the Senator from Texas will allow it to go over.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course I assume when the Senator says he wants to examine it that he means exactly what he says, and he does not mean it as a mere matter of delay.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Not at all.

Mr. BAILEY. I assume that, and I withdraw the request.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think the Senator will acquit me of ever having entered into an effort to delay any measure.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request is withdrawn.

SHERMAN AVENUE, IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the bill (S. 5882) to provide for the reassessment of benefits in the matter of the extension and widening of Sherman avenue, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

ASSOCIATION OF NAVAL MILITIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a few days ago the Senate ordered to be printed a public document known as "Document No. 435," the proceedings of the annual meeting of the Association of the Naval Militia of the United States. As there are but a few numbers available, I move that 1,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Association of the Naval Militia of the United States.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BURKETT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $15,000 for the extension of forest planting on forest reserves, of which not to exceed $2,500 may be used to construct a permanent station building on the Dismal River Forest Reserve, Nebraska, intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LATIMER submitted an amendment providing that patrons on all rural free-delivery mail routes that are now established or that may hereafter be established may put up for their individual use boxes constructed of such material as they may desire, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLACKBURN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,200 for the salary of one inspector of marine products in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—LEWIS D. SIMMONDS.

On motion of Mr. WARREN, it was Ordered, That on the application of Lewis D. Simmonds, he is authorized to withdraw from the files of the Senate all papers accompanying Senate bill No. 2073, Fifty-second Congress, first session, entitled "A bill to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Lewis D. Simmonds," there having been no adverse report thereon.

AGRICULTURAL LANDS IN FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. FULTON. Some days ago I entered a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill (H. R. 17576) to provide for the entry of agricultural lands within forest reserves was passed. I did so at the request of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], who desired to examine it and perhaps submit an amendment. Since then he has, I understand, said that the motion may be withdrawn. I ask leave, therefore, at this time, to withdraw the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon withdraws the motion to reconsider and the bill stands passed.

FOREIGN-BUILT DREDGES.

Mr. FRYE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 395) concerning foreign-built dredges, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

WM. P. FRYE,
J. H. GALLINGER,
JAMES H. BERRY,
Conferees on the part of the Senate.

C. H. GROSVENOR,
THOS. SPIGHT,
Conferees on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I have a large number of telegrams here from gentlemen in Illinois. I will ask that one of them be read, and will present the balance without reading. They are all upon the question of free passes to certain classes of people. I ask that the telegram which I send to the table be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The telegram will be read, if there is no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

CHICAGO, ILL., May 10, 1906.

S. M. CULLOM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

One hundred and twenty-five thousand railway employees of Illinois vigorously protest against the Senate amendment shutting off our families and dependents from securing free transportation. This will deprive us of the only privilege now granted and make it impossible for our families to travel without paying full fare. We have contended for this in our organizations for twenty-five years, and we certainly deplore the attitude of the Senate in such uncharitable action.

WM. CLARK,
Chief Conductor Order of Railway Conductors, No. 1, 5919 Wabash Avenue.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply desire to say that I have received a number of other dispatches of like tenor, and I file them all, so that they may be considered. I ask that they be laid on the table, as it is not worth while to refer them to the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. WARNER. I present certain telegrams and ask that the first be read and that all the telegrams be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the Senator from Missouri propose to print the telegrams in the RECORD?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will kindly restate his request.

Mr. WARNER. I ask that the first telegram be read and that the others be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, if every member of the Senate were to print in the RECORD all the telegrams he has received upon this subject, estimating them from my own experience, the RECORD would be burdened for the next two months to come.

Mr. WARNER. I could have burdened it for four months, but have made a few selections. However, I withdraw the request as to printing in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri requests the reading of the dispatch he has sent to the desk.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I only intended by what I said to make this point clear, that if one Senator is to print in the RECORD all of these protesting telegrams it would be but fair that every other Senator should do the same thing. I have received several score, probably a hundred of them, but thought it would be too burdensome to the RECORD for all of them to appear there.

Mr. WARNER. In reply I wish to say that I do not wish to burden the RECORD. I have possibly done so as little as anyone in the matter of printing in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the telegram.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, allow me to make one remark, lest I may have been misunderstood. I did not ask that the telegrams which I sent to the desk be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They were not so ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have in my hand about fifty, and I have twenty-five more that ought to go in the RECORD if those sent to the desk by the Senator from Missouri go in.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Missouri withdrew his request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the telegram, as requested by the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

MEMPHIS, TENN., May 10, 1906.

Senator WILLIAM WARNER,
Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of the locomotive engineers of Division 502, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, at Kansas City, Mo., you are requested to use your influence and vote against the amendment to Senate bill 2261, we knowing that the passage of this amendment will work a great hardship on the families of railroad employees throughout the country.

Respectfully, yours,

W. H. MEAD, Chief Engineer Division 502.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The dispatch just read and the others sent to the desk by the Senator from Missouri will lie on the table.

Mr. FORAKER. I have a telegram from the Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, which I think ought to be read and put in the RECORD, and I have about a hundred others, which I will ask some one to relieve me of. I send them to the desk to be filed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the telegram.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

MEMPHIS, TENN., May 10, 1906.

JOSEPH B. FORAKER
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

I am authorized by the Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers' convention to say that we earnestly protest against the adoption of the Senate amendment that discriminates against the issuing of transportation to grand officers of the different railroad organizations who are employed by the employees in the different classes of railroad service and also against the restriction of the issuing of transportation to the families of employees upon the different railroad systems, believing that this is an unfair and unjust discrimination against a class of worthy employees, and we hope that you will do all in your power to prevent the passage of this obnoxious amendment to the rate bill.

W. S. STONE, Grand Chief Engineer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The dispatches sent to the desk by the Senator from Ohio will lie on the table.

Mr. MCCREARY. I have received a number of telegrams on the subject referred to similar to the one which has just been read. I will not ask that any of them be published in the RECORD, but I simply make the announcement that I have received those telegrams, and I hope we will have an opportunity to rescind the amendment which was passed when the bill comes into the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. As all classes of persons interested in matters of this kind ought to be represented, and as I represent a very large constituency who have very little voice in the Federal Government, I will send to the desk and ask to have read the following dispatch.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested by the Senator from Alabama.

The dispatch was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

[Telegram.]

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., May 9, 1906.

JOHN T. MORGAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Understand Senate committee considering resolution forbidding railroads issuing free transportation employees families. This be great hardship, and hope you will use your influence to defeat.

J. W. BRYAN,
President Brotherhood Railway Cooks.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, during the pendency of the railway rate bill I have received just one letter from a citizen of New Hampshire concerning it, and he is a man who keeps a little country store and finds fault because an express train does not stop to take a quarter of beef to the Boston market for him when another train comes along two or three hours after and accommodates him. So from my experience there is not an overwhelming demand for this legislation in New Hampshire.

In the matter of the employees of the railroads, who want about 4,000,000 people granted the privilege of free passes, I have received just one telegram. I presume it is from a New Hampshire man. It is dated Memphis, Tenn., and I think he is attending a convention at that point. I will simply send it to the desk without reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The telegram will lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should think it very probable if the rate bill lingers much longer in the Senate, I may receive additional telegrams, as this seems to be an infectious disease.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I received a telegram from the president of a railroad company, saying that this legislation excluding the employees and their families would be detrimental both to the railroads and to the employees; that the present privilege which they enjoy gives them contentment, and it is regarded as a great boon; that they are more faithful in the service than they would be without it, and he thought it was a very decided mistake to make.

I think in the amendment adopted there was another mistake made equally great. It applied to attorneys exclusively employed by railroads. That would only apply to a very few attorneys in the United States. It would not apply to any local attorney, and the attorneys who are exclusively employed by a railroad have but little, if any, occasion to travel on the road. They are in their offices attending to the general business of the railroad and are not traveling, while the local attorneys are called upon to travel every few days to look after affairs about disasters and all that sort of thing. I think those two mistakes were made in that amendment, and when the amendment is before the Senate I hope some one will correct the mistake. If no one else does, I will try to do it myself.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I send telegrams to the desk, not to have them read, except the one which I have indicated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana requests the reading of a dispatch. Without objection, the Secretary will read it.

The telegram was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

[Telegram.]

PRINCETON, IND., May 10, 1906.

Senator A. J. BEVERIDGE,
Washington, D. C.

There are 600 railroad employees here who want the pass amendment modified so as to include families of employees; otherwise great hardship will result to railroad men.

M. W. FIELDS,
Attorney Southern Railroad Company.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, following the subject touched upon in these telegrams and the remarks by the Senator from Maine with reference to the attorneys of railroads, it is very necessary, in my opinion, that there should be an amendment, if that part of the bill is to stand, permitting the owners and care takers of live stock to be passed from their homes to the point of shipment and on the freight trains with the stock to the point of delivery and back to their homes as has always been the practice.

There should be no objection to such an amendment, if the railroad companies are willing to pass on freight trains, etc., with live stock, the owners and the necessary men in charge of same, because it insures more humane treatment en route and a better condition of live stock in arriving at destination for slaughter.

Nearly all live stock is shipped through more than one State to reach the markets for slaughter, a large portion of it coming from the western country, going to Missouri River points or to Chicago. The railroads, in making up freight charges on live stock, have really included the expense of carrying the men in charge. But under the proposed law, unless an amendment like the one proposed is adopted, they can not put these men on the bills of lading or pass them with the stock, nor from the stock tender's residence to and including point of shipment and point of delivery—that is, from his home, the round trip, back to his home, without collecting regular fare. While it is true, technically speaking, that railroads are compelled to receive, convey, and deliver live stock without the owners or agents attending them, etc., for loading, unloading, and caring for the stock en route, yet it is a common interest for the railroads, instead of carrying their own men under salary, to carry the owner or his men free without payment for service, the owners being willing to contribute the service of their men and including board and incidental expense, excepting only transportation for the sake of better treatment for the stock. The public is much better served, in that the live stock is more carefully loaded and unloaded and arrives at destination in a less bruised or fevered condition.

Thus both parties ought to desire the continuation of the present practice. Owners of live stock can not afford, in addition to the regular freight charges, wages of men, board, etc., to pay fares when riding over freight trains, as they do in one direction at least with the stock. Nor have we any reason to believe that the railroads will reduce the freight charges sufficiently to cover the fares if paid under the proposed law.

There practically has been no misuse or abuse of this transportation, since it is individual and nontransferable. It has been granted by all railroads alike, and hence does not tend to favoritism or discrimination, and of course causes no criticism and does no one an injustice.

I shall offer such an amendment at the proper time, if it is not offered by others, in the following words:

Or to owners and care takers of live stock when traveling with such stock, or when going to point of shipment or returning from point of delivery.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I desire to know whether or not it is proper at this time to offer an amendment or to serve notice that I will offer an amendment to the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]? If so, I desire to present such an amendment at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment can be presented at this time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then I desire to give notice that I will move to amend the amendment which is intended to be proposed by the senior Senator from Texas, when he offers such an amendment, as follows: Add after the word "dollars," on line 11, the amendment as proposed in the print, the following, which I read, because I think I can read it better than the clerks:

Provided, That said carrier of interstate commerce may, by arrangement with other carriers of interstate commerce, provide for free transportation of its bona fide employees and their families over the lines of such other carriers in connection with said free transportation over the lines of the carrier providing said free transportation.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I simply rise for the purpose of saying that not anticipating this eruption of telegrams, I left fifty or seventy-five at home.

I voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] for the reason that it deprives railway carriers of the right to give passes to the families of their employees. I could see nothing whatever to justify that restriction. It destroys a practice which has existed for a great many years and to which I think employees are fairly entitled, and I do not think they should be deprived of it. Under that amendment——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Wisconsin yield to his colleague?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island will state his question of order.

Mr. SPOONER. Why does the Senator raise a point of order against me, when he has sat here quietly through all this debate?

Mr. ALDRICH. I am trying to raise it on everyone so far as I can. My point of order is that this discussion is not now in order.

Mr. SPOONER. It will be in order when the bill comes before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order. Are there further bills or resolutions to be introduced?

Mr. DICK. I send to the desk, not to be read or printed, telegrams of like character as those already received, to be noted in the RECORD simply as petitions are noted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio?

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be noted, and to lie on the table, as follows:

A telegram from the Order of Railway Conductors of Cleveland, Ohio; and

A telegram from the Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers of Memphis, Tenn., remonstrating against the adoption of the amendment to the railway rate bill prohibiting the issuance of free transportation to bona fide employees and their families.

Mr. TILLMAN. I desire to introduce certain telegrams in the form of petitions similar to those which have been presented.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be noted, and to lie on the table, as follows:

Telegrams from citizens of Columbia, Greenville, Charleston, Winnsboro, Florence, and Timmonsville, all in the State of South Carolina; of Garrett, Ind., and of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, is the morning business closed?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not closed.

[Several bills were introduced, which appear under their proper heading.]

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not wish these telegrams put in the RECORD, but I should like to send them to the desk and say that I have received a great many more of the same kind.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be noted, and to lie on the table, as follows:

Telegrams from the International Association of Machinists of Denver, Colo.; from the officers and members of Local Division No. 29, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Pueblo, Colo., and from the officers and members of Local Division No. 541, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Denver, Colo.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have received six or eight dozen of these telegrams, which I now present.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Telegrams from E. M. Smith, of McDonough, Ga.; of A. C. Smith, of Selma, Ala.; D. H. Hopper and M. J. Burke, of Atlanta; L. O. Swain, C. P. Weekly, T. J. Russell, of Atlanta; Lawton & Cummins, of Savannah; J. D. Hermann, of Eastman; W. D. Kiddo and W. C. Warrell, of Cuthbert; T. E. Dunbar, of Macon; Joseph B. and Bryan Cumming, of Augusta; G. W. Warwick, of Smithville; A. G. and Julian McCarry, of Hartwell; J. W. Whidlen and A. G. Jennings, of Macon; De Lacy & Bishop, of Eastman; J. I. Hall, of Macon; Dorsey Brewster, Howell & McDaniel, of Atlanta; T. S. Moyes, of Savannah; W. A. Winburn, of Savannah, S. F. Parrott, of Macon; Shumate & Maddox, of Dalton; H. Sterling, of Macon; J. D. Hudson, of Americus; N. E. Harris, of Macon; T. B. Cabiness, of Forsythe; A. S. Bussey, of Wrightsville; Bennett & Conyers, of Brunswick; J. Randolph Anderson, of Savannah; C. E. Battle, of Columbus; Thomas K. Scott, of Augusta; John B. Little, of Atlanta; C. R. Faulkner, of Dalton; Fermon Barrett, of Toccoa; W. H. Harris, of Fort Valley; Homer Dickinson, of Macon; Simon W. Hitch, of Waycross; J. B. Burnside and C. P. McLaughlin, of Hamilton; John H. Welsh, of Atlanta; George E. Florence, of Augusta; R. L. J. Smith, of Jefferson; W. A. Woodall, of Atlanta; Oscar J. Coogler, of Jonesboro; M. H. Sandwich and B. L. Tysinger, of Thomaston; A. C. Brown, of Commerce; R. B. Edwards, of Eastman; W. P. Cole and H. L. D. McPherson, of Carrollton; E. T. Brown, of Atlanta; King & Spalding, of Atlanta, and J. J. Strickland, of Athens, all in the State of Georgia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed; and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 5, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, Mr. President, without being subject to the point of order by the Senator from Rhode Island, I in my own right will finish what I was about concluding.

Under the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas this might very well happen, and it illustrates the injustice of the restriction. If an engineer staying at his post in time of danger to save a train load of passengers is mortally wounded, his wife and children could not get to his bedside by the courtesy of the company which he serves and to whose interest, as well as the public interest, he had been faithful, but they would be obliged to pay their fare.

If there is a band of men in the United States entitled—their families as well as themselves—to the consideration of their employers, it is the railway train men, who are faithful, devoted, brave, and patient. It is a rare thing, Mr. President, for one of them to be found shirking his duty.

I voted against this amendment because my colleague had offered an amendment which in this respect seemed to me infinitely more just to the railway men of the country, and when the time comes——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Wisconsin yield to his colleague?

Mr. SPOONER. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The amendment which I had proposed to offer——

Mr. SPOONER. I referred to that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Requires a little further amendment in order to meet objections which have been raised here this morning, and at the appropriate time (I would do it now if it could be done) I should like to offer that amendment for consideration.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me one moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It would relieve many Senators from having to respond to a large number of telegrams and letters which will continue to pour in upon us. I think the matter could be settled here in fifteen minutes if a proper provision is presented, and it could be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to say for the information of the Senator from Wisconsin that when the bill is in the Senate it will be open to amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that.

Mr. FRYE. And having been agreed to now, it is not open to amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that. I was precluded from offering the amendment at the proper time in Committee of the Whole, because I chanced to be off the floor when the last line of section 1 was under consideration, and we passed the point when I could have offered the amendment. I shall offer it in the Senate whenever we take the bill up for consideration there.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that there is no pending question before the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I can make one in a minute, if that is necessary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will entertain a question.

Mr. SPOONER. I yield to the Senator from Iowa, who will offer an amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, to relieve the situation in many ways, I hope, as respects this matter, I now move, on page 2, line 5, to strike out the words "and fairly remunerative."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary. The Senator is reading from the printed copy of the amendments as prepared by the Senate?

Mr. ALLISON. I am not reading from the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10 of the bill, in lines 20 and 21, strike out the words "and fairly remunerative" after the word "reasonable."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to yield to me for just one moment.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say at this time, Mr. President, that I have also received many telegrams on this subject. I was afraid I would not be able to make that statement unless I embraced this opportunity. I am in sympathy with the telegrams as respects those who are employed by the railroads.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, continuing my observations for one moment only——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SPOONER. I will, in one moment.

I had two purposes in view in addressing the Chair upon this subject, one was to explain why I voted against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] which was adopted. I am opposed to the granting of railway passes to Members of Congress, to public officials, and to the general public, but I think the line should be drawn as has been here suggested. Second, I wanted to say a few words in support of the justice of the proposition, which the Senator from Texas has partly covered by a proposed substitute to his own amendment, allowing railway companies to issue passes to their employees and the families of their employees as they always have done. That is all.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have not spoken on this subject before.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair first recognized the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE].

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senator from Indiana had already spoken.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have not spoken on this subject since the bill was taken up this morning.

Mr. President, I merely rise to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], and the attention of his colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] as well, to the fact that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] on yesterday remedied the defects to which all these telegrams call attention, except in one particular, and that this morning I have given notice of an intention to move an amendment to his amendment, when he shall offer it, to still further completely remedy the defects to which these telegrams call attention. I call the attention of the senior Senator from Wisconsin to the fact, and also call the attention of his colleague to the fact, that the Senator from Texas has modified his amendment so as to include railway employees and their families amongst those to be entitled to receive free transportation; and this morning I have moved an amendment to provide that the carrier may provide for interchangeable transportation, so that the employee of any carrier and the family of that employee may be given free passes, not only over the road of the carrier issuing the same, but over connecting lines, which, I think, completely covers the defects which the telegrams have been complaining against.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order, that the feature of the bill which is being discussed by Senators is not now in order before the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I——

Mr. NELSON. I think the question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and that we had better adhere to that. When we take up this other subject, we can then discuss it in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. I thought the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] had yielded the floor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire simply to make a brief statement about the matter that has just been considered.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Indiana can not yield to the Senator from Texas for a statement. I do not understand whether the Senator from Indiana holds the floor or the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Indiana yielded to me for a statement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I yielded to the Senator from Texas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, in view of the statements which have been made this morning, I think it is proper to say that when the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] was before the Senate the other day it included three propositions: A prohibition against the issuance of free passes; a prohibition against the issuing of commutation tickets or reduced fares, and also a prohibition which might have been construed, and which some of us did construe, as affecting local questions in the South which we did not desire raised in the Senate. The object of my amendment was to confine the question to the issuance of free passes only. In drafting that amendment, as I did here in the Senate with a pencil very hastily, although the words "and their families" were written in in pencil in some way they were stricken out, probably at the suggestion of somebody, or probably inadvertently by myself, and on yesterday I offered a substitute, after having entered the motion to reconsider, and stated that, if the motion to reconsider were adopted by the Senate, I would offer the substitute in lieu of the amendment.

In addition to that, Mr. President, I desire to say, in view of the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], that I intended to modify that further by adding:

Provided, That this provision shall not be construed to prohibit the interchange of passes for officers, employees, and members of the families of employees.

Undertaking, if I can, to cover—and it will be covered—absolutely and thoroughly that phase of the question when the motion to reconsider comes up and this substitute which I have proposed is taken up for consideration.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CLAPP. My inquiry is as to the situation, whether or not it would be in order to grant unanimous consent for the reconsideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]? I think there is no question, and there is not a Senator in this room but realizes that the vote by which that amendment was passed should be reconsidered. We have got to meet the question at some time, and it will save an immense amount of embarrassment, it seems to me, if it can be disposed of now.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought to go on in regular order. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] offered an amendment a while ago which seems to have been almost lost sight of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Replying to the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], the Chair thinks it is competent for the Senate, by unanimous consent, to return to any order that has been passed; but one objection would, of course, prevent doing so.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. DANIEL and Mr. OVERMAN. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 10 of the printed bill, after the word "reasonable," in line 20, it is proposed to strike out the words "and fairly remunerative."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer an amendment on page 11, line 5, after the word "prescribed," to strike out the remainder of the clause down to and including the word "carrier," in line 7, and to insert in lieu thereof what I have sent to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 5, after the word "prescribed," it is proposed to strike out:

Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

All orders of the Commission, except orders for the payment of money, shall take effect within such reasonable time and shall continue in force for such period of time, not exceeding two years, as shall be prescribed in the order of the Commission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, which has just been stated.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa why the limitation of two years is placed upon the orders of the Commission changing the rate?

Mr. ALLISON. The bill as it now stands has a limitation of three years. I should think that two years would suffice to test the value of the order, and, of course, if it is a valuable order, it will remain undoubtedly in process of execution by the railroads themselves. I do not think it is a very important matter; indeed, I have paid very little attention to this limitation. Two years seem to me to be long enough.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I understand the purpose of the limitation, it is to annul the rate fixed by the Commission at the end of the period of two years and leave the railroad company free to restore the old rate or any other rate which it may choose to fix. In order that I may be speaking to something, Mr. President, I will move——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator is in order in speaking to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], which is pending.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, I will move to strike out the limitation of two years, which the amendment makes upon the rate fixed by the Commission, to the end that the Commission rate shall continue in force until the railway company shows that it should be changed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "time," where it appears on line 8 of the printed amendment of Mr. ALLISON, it is proposed to strike out the words "not exceeding two years;" so that if amended it will read:

All orders of the Commission, except orders for the payment of money, shall take effect within such reasonable time and shall continue in force for such period of time as shall be prescribed in the order of the Commission.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, after the Commission has made an investigation and determined that a given rate is reasonable, that rate should remain in force until it is shown to be an unjust and unreasonable compensation for the service rendered. I know of no reason why such rate should expire by limitation.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I only rise to interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin because he says that he has never heard any reason assigned for a limitation of the duration of the order of the Commission. I am very glad to state to him that in the original bill drawn by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which they submitted to the Interstate Commerce Committee, the suggestion of the Commission was that the order should only last and be continued in force for one year; and the letters addressed to the chairman of the committee, which I had the opportunity of reading, which accompanied that bill, stated that in the rapid changes in this country, and especially the changes that affected transportation and conditions upon which transportation rates are predicated, the initiative of the railroad ought to reattach every year. This amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] extends it to two years. I should favor two years, and I think it ought to stand at two years; but I quite agree with the statement made by Mr. Knapp, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in his letter to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, that there ought to be a period when the initiative ought to go back to the railroad company because of the changed situation which affects the question of rates and the question of practice as well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I submit, Mr. President, after this Commission has gone over the ground, made an investigation, and fixed a rate, it ought not to be set aside at the end of a two-year period or at the end of any period unless that rate is found for some sufficient reason to be such a rate as ought no longer to be maintained. The Commission will be able to accomplish very little in fixing rates if the Commission's rates are to expire by limitation and the railroad rates be restored without any reason whatever for such change. I am very certain that the only reason why the Commission ever suggested such a limitation in the first draft of the bill which they proposed was because they believed that they could not at the present time secure broad and comprehensive legislation from Congress. If they could at this time be clothed with authority to determine rates upon their own motion, then, sir, I am sure they would not recommend a time limitation upon the rates fixed by the Commission. If this bill were amended in that important particular the Commission would have full authority to revise a rate upon their own motion, if justice to the carrier or the public required that it should be done. Rate making by the Commission upon complaint only will be a slow process at best. The work ought to stand, unless there is some good reason for setting it aside. If there is good reason for changing a rate once fixed by the Commission, it can be made to appear upon investigation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, page 11, line 9, after the word "jurisdiction," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That no order of the Commission shall be set aside or suspended by any preliminary or interlocutory decree or order of any court or judge.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, in his message to Congress on the 6th of December, 1904, President Roosevelt indorsed the principle and the purpose of this amendment in the most emphatic language. These were his words:

While I am of the opinion that at present it would be undesirable, if it were not impracticable, finally to clothe the Commission with general authority to fix railroad rates, I do believe that, as a fair security to shippers, the Commission should be vested with the power, where a given rate has been challenged and after full hearing found to be unreasonable, to decide, subject to judicial review, what shall be a reasonable rate to take its place; the ruling of the Commission to take effect immediately, and to obtain unless and until it is reversed by the court of review. The Government must, in increasing degree, supervise and regulate the workings of the railways engaged in interstate commerce; and such increased supervision is the only alternative to an increase of the present evils on the one hand or a still more radical policy on the other. In my judgment the most important legislative act now needed as regards the regulation of corporations is this act to confer on the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to revise rates and regulations, the revised rate to at once go into effect, and to stay in effect unless and until the court of review reverses it.

It will be observed that the President was so deeply impressed with the importance of maintaining the Commission's rate "unless and until it is reversed by the courts" that he urges it twice in the same paragraph. Indeed, sir, only a single sentence separates his first from his second declaration, and the important words in both are precisely the same. It must have been a profound conviction that could lead a scholarly man to repeat himself in such close connection.

In his speech delivered at Raleigh, N. C., on the 19th of October, 1905, the President restated his position on the railroad question, and, while he modified it in another important respect, he made no change whatever in this respect. Here is what he said:

But, in my judgment, the most important thing to do is to give this administrative body power to make its findings effective, and this can be done only by giving it the power, when complaint is made of a given rate as being unjust or unreasonable, if it finds the complaint proper then itself to fix a maximum rate which it regards as just and reasonable, this rate to go into effect practically at once—that is, within a reasonable time—and to stay in effect until reversed by the courts.

In this statement the President abandons his first and sensible demand for an absolute rate and adopts the dangerous expedient of a maximum rate; but he still adheres with tenacious fidelity to his original insistence that the rate when once fixed by the Commission should remain in effect "until and unless reversed by the courts." Thus in a solemn message to Congress and again in a carefully prepared speech he has recognized that the only way in which the rate-making power of the Commission can be rendered most effective for the public protection was to keep the rate of the Commission in effect until it is reversed by the courts.

The President of the United States understands as well as any Senator in this body, and he understands as well as any citizen in this country, the difference between "suspending" and "reversing" an order of the Commission. He knows as well as I do—and I know as well as any living man can know—that "to suspend" is an intermediate process, while "to reverse" is a final determination of the case; and, therefore, when he declared that the rate of the Commission should "stay in effect until reversed by the courts," he meant precisely what I am now seeking to accomplish.

With these two recommendations before me, I had every right to assume that an amendment designed to carry them into effect would receive the President's cordial and active support; and yet recent events make it manifest that he has compromised again with the opponents of this legislation, and has committed both himself and his friends against a proposition which may be fairly described as his own. He assured, and then he reassured, his countrymen that he earnestly desires to keep the Commission's rate in effect until it shall be reversed by the court; and although I have found him an open and an easy way to reach that result, he refuses to follow it.

It must not be understood that in saying this it is my purpose to withhold from the President of the United States the credit to which he is justly entitled for this legislation. No hope of a partisan advantage can restrain me from admitting that, without his help, even this imperfect and insufficient bill could have never become a law; but while I cheerfully make that acknowledgment of his services, his best friends must sincerely deplore that he did not keep his face set resolutely against every effort to emasculate this bill. Whether he was weary of the conflict and surrendered, as some men charge, or whether he yielded to the appeals for party harmony, as other men believe, I do not pretend to judge. But whether it was the one or the other, or whether it was neither or both, he will find it difficult to explain to the American people why it is that he has raised their hope so high and then has fulfilled it in such slight degree.

Mr. President, I realize that the time for argument on this question is over, and that nothing which can now be said will change the vote of any Senator; but before it passes entirely from our consideration I want to incorporate in the RECORD the latest expression which I have been able to find from law books on this subject. It is from a recent work—so recent that, though I had purchased it on approval, I had not, for the want of time, examined it, and it was called to my attention by a distinguished lawyer who formerly represented a Georgia district in the House of Representatives. It is entitled "Federal Statutes Annotated," and consists of 10 volumes. The eighth and ninth volumes are devoted to a consideration of the Constitution by sections, and in the eighth volume I find a chapter dealing with the power of Congress to create inferior Federal courts. I find that this work refers, just as I did in my speech, the power to create these courts, not to the judiciary clause of the Constitution, but to that provision which authorizes Congress "to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court," and lays down the law as follows:

This section—

After quoting the section to which I have referred—

This section delegates power to Congress to organize courts, and therein delegates to Congress power both to authorize the issue and to suspend the issue of the writ of habeas corpus, because that is a judicial writ, and the power to organize courts includes the power of determining what writs they may issue, or not issue, from time to time; hence it was necessary to place the restriction upon the power thus delegated to Congress to legislate for the courts which is contained in section 9, viz, that Congress should not, in so legislating, withhold from them the right to issue the well-known judicial writ of habeas corpus, except, etc.

Mr. President, if the Congress possesses the power to prevent a preliminary injunction suspending the Interstate Commerce Commission's order, surely it can not excuse itself for failing or refusing to exercise that power to the fullest extent. That the injunctive power of the courts ought not to be heedlessly or unnecessarily curtailed, I might freely grant without abating my support of this amendment. A controversy between two individuals or a controversy between a body of individuals and a corporation does not present the question which confronts us here. In those cases there will have been no ascertainment of the facts, no careful opinion rendered by a Government tribunal, as in the case of a rate fixed by the Commission, to be suspended without a due and full inquiry. The rate of the Commission when once established becomes the law of the land, and it is a monstrous proposition to allow inferior judges to suspend the law of the land without a full and complete inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BERRY and Mr. BLACKBURN demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], and therefore am not at liberty to vote. I understand if he were present, he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. I do not see him in the Chamber. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TELLER. My colleague [Mr. PATTERSON] is paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. DICK] is not present, and if there is no objection, I will transfer to him my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], and will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 54, as follows:

YEAS—23.

Bailey	Dubois	Latimer	Rayner
Berry	Foster	McCreary	Simmons
Blackburn	Frazier	McEnery	Stone
Burkett	Gearin	McLaurin	Teller

NOT VOTING—12.

Burnham	Depew	Heyburn	Patterson
Burton	Dick	Mallory	Proctor
Carmack	Gorman	Money	Warren

So Mr. BAILEY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I offer what I send to the desk as an amendment to the amendment. It is the part between the marked lines.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I wish to say that I was detained in a committee room and did not get here in time to vote on the proposition last voted upon. I should be glad to be recorded. My pair is the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], and I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that I be allowed to vote.

Mr. WARREN. In that case I ask that I be recorded, also.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I raise the point of order that under the rules the Senators can not be recorded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The vote having been announced, under the rules the Senators are precluded from recording their votes.

Mr. MONEY. Then I ask permission of the Senate to say how I would have voted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MONEY. I would have voted "yea" if I had been present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. CULBERSON. As an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa having been agreed to, the Chair is of opinion that the proposed amendment of the Senator from Texas is not in order at the present stage of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, it has not been agreed to; and I offer this amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. It has not been agreed to. I wish to modify the amendment by inserting after the word "time," where it occurs the first time, the words "not less than thirty days."

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood that this amendment had been agreed to.

Several SENATORS. No!

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] rose to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and the only amendment that has been proposed by the Senator from Iowa has been agreed to. But the Chair now understands that the Senator from Texas rose to amend an amendment which has not been formally offered. The Senator from Iowa proposes the following amendment——

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I rise to a point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota will state his point of order.

Mr. NELSON. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa was adopted, and we took up the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. NELSON. That is the status of the case. Now, we can not take up the amendment of the Senator from Iowa without reconsidering the vote by which it was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. CULBERSON. I rise to a point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will state his point of order.

Mr. CULBERSON. The first amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa was adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. CULBERSON. It was to strike out the words "and fairly remunerative." The other amendment, at the bottom of page 310, has not been adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. Then I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is it an amendment to the amendment already agreed to?

Mr. CULBERSON. It is an amendment to that section, to follow the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If it follows the amendment and is not an amendment to the amendment, it is in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is not an amendment to the amendment. I offer it in any form, to get it in order.

Mr. CULLOM. I rise to a point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois will state his point of order.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator means that the amendment to strike out the words "and fairly remunerative" was not agreed to, he is mistaken.

Mr. CULBERSON. I stated the very opposite.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The words "and fairly remunerative" were stricken out upon a vote of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. Exactly. That is what I said.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas offers an amendment. Where shall it be inserted?

Mr. CULBERSON. I am still of the opinion that the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], at the bottom of page 310, has not been adopted, because the amendment of my colleague was an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, that is a mistake. I offered an amendment to the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well. Then I offer the amendment I send to the desk, to follow the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let it be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

The SECRETARY. On page 11 of the bill, at the end of line 9, after the word "jurisdiction," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That if such rate so fixed by the Commission is in violation of the rights of any party in interest secured by the Constitution of the United States the party so affected may proceed against the Commission by appropriate proceedings in equity in any circuit court of the United States of competent jurisdiction to enjoin the enforcement of such order and rate: Provided further, That in determining what is a just and reasonable rate no consideration shall be given fictitious stock issued by the carrier, or bonds or other obligations of the carrier, issued in excess of the fair value of its property: Provided further, That no circuit or other court of the United States, and no judge thereof in vacation, shall annul, restrain, enjoin, or otherwise interfere with the enforcement or operation of a rate and order established and made by the Interstate Commerce Commission provided for in this act until a petition, declaration, bill of complaint, or other proper statement of the cause of action is filed in said court or presented to said judge in vacation and the Interstate Commerce Commission is duly and legally served with a copy thereof at least ten days prior to any action taken by the court or judge thereon and until said Commission has had opportunity within said ten days to answer by proper pleadings and present testimony in like form as the complainants therein: Provided further, That in such proceedings either party to the suit may appeal immediately and directly to the Supreme Court of the United States from the final decree therein, or from any interlocutory or preliminary restraining order therein, whether granted during the term or in vacation, by which the rate and order so established and made by the Commission is enjoined in whole or in part: Provided further, That said appeal must be taken within thirty days from the entry of such order or decree, and said case so appealed shall be advanced and take precedence in the Supreme Court of all cases of a different character therein: Provided further, That the circuit court, or the judge thereof, or the Supreme Court, or any justice thereof, may direct that the final decree or the interlocutory or preliminary restraining order, from which an appeal is taken, shall be stayed during the pendency of such appeal.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senate has declined to prevent preliminary injunctions entirely, I sincerely hope they will agree to prevent them until there is a hearing. Of course I can not understand the principle which denies to Congress the power to prevent them until the hearing, and yet concedes the power of Congress to prevent them until a hearing. Why all this difference should be between "a" and "the" is beyond my comprehension, but I certainly hope the Senate will at least restrain the court some.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, lest my vote upon this amendment should be misunderstood, permit me to say a word. I believe that the Senate, without involving the question in as extensive verbiage as this amendment contains, will in due time provide that no interlocutory order shall be issued until notice is given the Interstate Commerce Commission and a hearing had upon the application for the restraining order or temporary injunction. From the very beginning of this discussion I have insisted, with proper regard for the bill, that amendments should be confined to the narrowest possible scope. This bill in the beginning was prepared with great care. The first draft was made, I believe, by experts who had been working with interstate-commerce traffic for years. Subsequently the bill was given most patient and long-continued consideration in the Committee on Interstate Commerce in the House of Representatives, approved by the Attorney-General of the United States, after a thorough examination, and it is approved, I believe, by a majority of this body.

It occurs to me, as it has occurred to me in the beginning, that extensive amendments should not be encouraged. If aught was needed to demonstrate the wisdom of that position, the confused and confusing debate which occurred in the Chamber this morning on the antipass amendment of the Senator from Texas considered here anew, amidst a shower of protesting telegrams, should have furnished the Senate a demonstration that its hands in open session had better be kept off any hastily drawn amendment to the bill.

The amendment of the Senator from Texas was presented with the best possible intent, but even with all the amendments suggested to that amendment here this morning, in the light of admonition from persons from Maine to California and from the Lakes to the Gulf, it would still be a poor measure if adopted. I am prepared to make a half dozen suggestions, which I think the Senate will readily concede are founded in good sound policy, to the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Now comes another amendment, extensive in verbiage, covering a variety of topics, no doubt, read for the first time from the desk, and we are called upon to vote for it because, forsooth, it contains the little virtue of providing that notice shall be given and a hearing had before a restraining order is issued. These points will be found carefully presented and guarded in a brief amendment to be offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fact that the provisions of the amendment proposed by me have been before the Senate in various forms, and the Senator will find the amendment printed, May 7, pages 284 and 285 of the printed pamphlet. It was here in ample time for consideration by the Senate.

Mr. CARTER. That reference furnishes but another evidence of the virtue of the contention I have made from the beginning. This bill in itself consists of 26 pages. We have presented for consideration to the Senate 320 pages of amendments, besides additional amendments presented from time to time, not included in this bound pamphlet. Will you tell me, I pray, what sort of a bill this will be if these amendments, good, bad, and indifferent, are adopted and attached to or injected into the bill?

Mr. President, the closer we adhere to the original text of the bill the nearer we will be to procuring a logical piece of legislation, destined to accomplish the primary purpose, to wit, the vesting of power in the Interstate Commerce Commission to substitute a reasonable rate for an unreasonable rate. I shall vote against this amendment because it is too extensive, covers too many questions, and is calculated to confuse rather than to strengthen the primary purpose of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, we all know that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has been suffering from illness for several days past. He is in the Chamber to-day for the purpose of offering certain amendments which have been prepared by him. I suggest to Senators that we allow this bill to be read right along by sections, and that we all abstain from offering our amendments for the time being, to the end that the Senator from Iowa may offer his amendments and have them acted upon. We can always go back to the bill, even if the whole of it is read, and amend it in Committee of the Whole. I trust the Senator from Texas will be good enough to withdraw, for the time being, his amendment and allow the Senator from Iowa to offer his amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

Mr. CULBERSON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROCTOR (when his name was called). I again announce my pair on all votes on this measure with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SPOONER. I again announce my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK]. If I were permitted to vote I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bacon	Dubois	McLaurin	Simmons
Berry	Foster	Martin	Stone
Blackburn	Frazier	Money	Taliaferro
Clark, Mont.	Gearin	Morgan	Teller
Clarke, Ark.	La Follette	Newlands	Tillman
Clay	Latimer	Overman
Culberson	McCreary	Pettus
Daniel	McEnery	Rayner

NAYS—50.

Aldrich	Allison	Brandegee	Burnham
Alger	Ankeny	Bulkeley	Burrows
Allee	Beveridge	Burkett	Carter
Clapp	Foraker	Kittredge	Piles
Clark, Wyo.	Frye	Knox	Platt
Crane	Fulton	Lodge	Scott
Cullom	Gallinger	Long	Smoot
Dick	Gamble	McCumber	Sutherland
Dillingham	Hale	Millard	Warner
Dolliver	Hansbrough	Nelson	Warren
Dryden	Hemenway	Nixon	Wetmore
Elkins	Hopkins	Penrose
Flint	Kean	Perkins

NOT VOTING—10.

Bailey	Depew	Mallory	Spooner
Burton	Gorman	Patterson
Carmack	Heyburn	Proctor

So Mr. CULBERSON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. BACON. I offer an amendment, to come in after the word "jurisdiction," at the same place as the amendment just proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 11 of the regular bill, at the end of line 9, insert:

No rate or charge, regulation or practice, prescribed by the Commission shall be restrained, set aside, suspended, or modified by any interlocutory or preliminary order or decree of the court unless upon the hearing, after such full notice to the Commission as herein prescribed, the same shall be considered and concurred in and ordered by at least two judges presiding in said hearing, at least one of whom shall be a judge of the circuit court of the United States or a circuit justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary indicate the page in order that Senators may turn to it.

The SECRETARY. Page 235 of the large pamphlet.

Mr. TELLER. Where does it come in the bill?

Mr. BACON. At the same place as the last amendment.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 9, page 11, of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think this is a very important amendment, and I trust it may receive the careful consideration of Senators. I am as anxious as anyone that there shall be no improvident or hasty or ill-advised interference with any order of the Commission fixing rates after complaint made. I desire most earnestly that the orders of the Commission shall go into effect and remain in effect unless the constitutional rights of parties require that they be suspended. I was constrained to vote against the amendment which prohibited under any circumstances the issuance of an interlocutory order or decree, because, in my judgment, such a provision in this bill would be unconstitutional, and so believing, under my obligation I could not vote otherwise.

I will simply pause long enough to say that the ground upon which I base my conclusion as to the unconstitutionality of such provision is not that the Congress has no right under any circumstances to control and prohibit the exercise of the writ or process of injunction. In my opinion there are some circumstances where Congress can do so, and that in other circumstances it has no constitutional power to do so. I base my opinion that Congress can not constitutionally do so in this particular case upon the belief that Congress can not control and prohibit the exercise by the courts of the process of injunction in the proposed law, if that process of injunction is the only one by the exercise of which by the courts the provisions of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States can be made of force and effect. Unless this constitutional provision can be enforced by the courts it is simply a piece of waste paper. I hold that Congress does not have the right, if that is the only process of the courts by which the fifth amendment can be made of force and effect, to destroy that only remedy and thus nullify that most important and vital constitutional provision. It is the duty of Congress to so legislate as to make effective the provisions of the Constitution. I feel it due to myself to state that much. If there is any other process by which the courts can perfectly protect the citizen in the guaranties of the fifth amendment, I do not know what it is. Of course I will not undertake to go into the argument or to elaborate it. In my opinion Congress can prohibit the exercise of the process of injunction when such prohibition is to prevent its being used to imperil or destroy personal liberty or property rights. I do not believe that Congress can prohibit the exercise of the process of injunction when such exercise is essential for the protection of personal liberty or of the rights of property guaranteed by the Constitution.

I wish to direct the attention of the Senate, however, to the provisions of the particular amendment I now offer.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. I make the suggestion to the Senator from Georgia that he offer his amendment to the amendment which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is going to offer to the next section. It is the same subject-matter exactly and covers substantially the same ground.

Mr. BACON. The purpose I have in offering it now is that the subject-matter has been brought to the attention of the Senate in the amendment we have just voted on, denying the right to issue any preliminary injunction, and I desire that this shall come in the same connection.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Iowa has already given notice that he will offer an amendment to the next section covering the question of preliminary injunction, and I suggest to the Senator, if it is equally agreeable to him, to offer his amendment to that amendment.

Mr. BACON. I prefer to offer it here.

Mr. ALDRICH. All right.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, there is undoubtedly a great evil found frequently in the practice of the courts in the improvident grant of interlocutory or preliminary injunctions, and it is intended in this very grave and important matter, as the right is still to be exercised by the court, to throw around it all possible safeguards, so that there shall be no hasty, no ill-advised, no improvident grant of an injunction, and to guard against the possibility—I use the word "possibility" because it is the most extreme word—to guard against the possibility of any judge being influenced by any but the highest motives or having the opportunity to act when influenced by any but the highest motives in the administration of justice.

Mr. President, I ask Senators to consider carefully this question. It is a well-recognized feature of the circuit courts of the United States that more than one judge presides in the determination of questions. It is not a requirement of the law that more than one shall preside in the consideration and determination of questions, but it is a provision in much wisdom which permits and authorizes the consideration of questions by not only two judges but by three judges sitting together upon the circuit bench.

Mr. President, that is not done as a reflection upon any one judge or as an evidence of distrust in any one judge. It is done because it is recognized that in the multitude of counsel there is wisdom. It is done for the same reason that we put nine judges upon the Supreme Bench, not that there is distrust of any one of the nine, but that in the consideration of the grave questions which must necessarily come before that court there shall be the advantage to be gained in the coming together of a number of minds in the consideration of the same question. And further, if there is a question of grave doubt and difficulty where men may differ, that there may be among so large a number of judges the opportunity for a majority to decide aright.

Mr. President, I beg that Senators will consider this situation. Here is the very gravest of questions, one of the most far-reaching. Under the law as it now exists, any district judge in the United States is authorized to exercise circuit court powers. With the right to pass upon the question of a preliminary injunction, in the absence of some such provision as this it will be competent for any district judge in the United States to arrest the order of the Commission by an interlocutory order or decree.

This provision does not simply ask that more than one judge shall be called upon and shall concur with the judge before an interlocutory decree can be issued, but it provides that at least one of them shall be a circuit judge of the United States. In other words, it can not be done even by two district judges. It may be done by one district judge and one circuit judge, or one circuit justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. Under our system the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States exercise circuit court powers and sit on the circuit court. Therefore the amendment provides that before an interlocutory order or decree may issue there must be two judges who shall concur in the order, and that at least one of them shall be a circuit judge or a circuit justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. FULTON. I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa it will require that three judges shall sit and hear the application for an injunction under the expediting act.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection to the number being made three.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator if he does not think it better really to place it under the expediting act by an independent provision?

Mr. BACON. But the expediting act is not the law under which the interlocutory decree will be issued.

Mr. FULTON. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa proposes to apply it.

Mr. BACON. On what page is the amendment to which the Senator refers?

Mr. FULTON. On page 319, lines 9 and 10, of the latest print of the amendments. The original text reads:

The provision of an act to expedite the hearing and determination of suits——

Mr. BACON. There is nothing said there about interlocutory decrees.

Mr. FULTON. Yes; if the Senator will look at line 9:

Including the hearing on an application for a preliminary injunction.

The Senator would not want to require that all interlocutory orders and decrees should be heard before three judges or even two judges?

Mr. BACON. The amendment offered by me does not provide that there shall be two for any and all interlocutory orders or decrees, but does provide that there shall be two in all interlocutory orders or decrees which suspend the order of the Commission. That is the scope of it.

Mr. FULTON. This provides that there shall be three.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I take it that was not intended to apply to a great many orders made in the progress of an equity suit, orders to take testimony and formal orders that ought not to require three judges.

Mr. BACON. The provision does not call for anything of the kind. It expressly limits this requirement to the case of an order suspending the order of the Commission. It does not go any further than that. I will read it again for the Senator.

No rate or charge, regulation or practice prescribed by the Commission shall be restrained, set aside, etc.

Mr. FULTON. What amendment is the Senator reading from?

Mr. BACON. I am reading from my amendment.

I hope Senators will not misunderstand that. The amendment is in print before them, and it is limited in its scope entirely to the restraining, setting aside, suspending, or modifyng any rate or charge, regulaton or practice made by the Commission and does not refer in any manner to any other interlocutory order or decree. It relates to them solely.

If the Senator from Oregon will pardon me for a moment, he calls my attention to the proposed amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], which is found on page 318 of this compilation, which I will read, and which will be offered by him later. I read it for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not it is true, as suggested by the Senator from Oregon, that the provision which I seek to have incorporated is already included in this proposed amendment. The amendment which is going to be proposed by the Senator from Iowa, which is found on page 318, is as follows:

Provided, That no injunction, interlocutory order, or decree suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the Commission shall be granted except on hearing——

Mr. LONG. That is not the amendment.

Mr. BACON. That is the one I was referred to.

Mr. LONG. It is on the same page, lines 9 and 10.

Mr. BACON. Oh, yes; "The provisions of an act to expedite"——

Mr. FULTON. Those are the lines to which I called the attention of the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I beg pardon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is obliged to inform the Senator from Georgia that his time has expired.

Mr. BACON. I am sorry that I was interrupted and that I was not permitted to present in full the argument in favor of the amendment.

Mr. DUBOIS obtained the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to reply briefly to the suggestions made by the Senator from Georgia. Have I the floor?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho has the floor.

Mr. DUBOIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa, but I do not want to have his remarks taken out of my time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Idaho next.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Georgia, it is an amendment intended to meet the situation as respects injunctions, and that question is also met by certain amendments which I have proposed to the bill. I believe that sufficient safeguards are thrown around these amendments, and that they are to be preferred really to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The bill as it came to us from the House incorporated in its provisions what is known as the "expediting act" of February 11, 1903. So if we had not dealt with this question at all, the present status of the law on that subject is such that all these applications for injunctions would have gone to the circuit court, and there would have been three judges assigned to the hearing, as I understand the expediting act of 1903.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; that is right.

Mr. ALLISON. Three judges would be assigned, two of whom must be circuit judges. So if nothing had been done in the Senate upon that subject, the bill as it came to us from the House would have brought these preliminary injunctions under the provisions of the expediting law of 1903, as I understand it.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. As I understand it—and I ask the Senator if I am correct in the opinion—the "expediting act," so called, will not apply or be operative in any of these proceedings until the Attorney-General shall file the statement that it is of public importance, and so on, required by that expediting act.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true.

Mr. STONE. Suppose he does not do that?

Mr. ALLISON. He is required to do it by the bill under consideration.

Mr. STONE. Absolutely?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; it is made his duty to do it. Under the bill as it came to us from the House it was assumed, at least, that all the provisions respecting injunctions were already provided for; but now, to make it absolutely certain that there could be no difference of opinion upon it, there is an amendment inserted on page 10 whereby it is proposed to incorporate into the House provision these words:

> The provisions of "An act to expedite the hearing and determination of suits in equity, etc.," approved February 11, 1903, shall be, and are hereby, made applicable to all such suits.

Then the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] on my behalf the other day added the words "including the hearing on an application for a preliminary injunction." So there can be no question about the application of this statute to these injunction proceedings.

I submit to the Senator from Georgia that the provisions in the following pages in section 5 of the bill cover the entire case of injunctions—preliminary, interlocutory, and otherwise—in what I think a much safer way than is proposed by his amendment, and it provides also for an appeal directly to the Supreme Court in these cases and for the expediting of the cases in the Supreme Court.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question, with his permission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I am not at all anxious that my particular amendment shall be adopted.

Mr. ALLISON. So I understand.

Mr. BACON. All I want is the assurance from the Senator that when we come to that provision which he says now covers it, if necessary the Senator will be willing to insert either two or three judges, as he may see fit, so as to make it beyond doubt that there will be a requirement for either two or three judges to concur in an order before an interlocutory decree can be issued restraining or setting aside or modifying the order of the Commission. If I have that assurance from the Senator, I will be content.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that these provisions provide for three judges, and if they are not so provided for certainly, I believe that that provision should be inserted.

Mr. BACON. Very well. With that assurance from the Senator I am perfectly willing that it be passed until we reach that point in his amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield to the Senator from Nevada. I yield, however, to the Senator from Idaho first.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] is to take the floor in his own right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho wishes to take the floor in his own right.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that the act for the expedition of suits is only to be set in motion upon the application of the Attorney-General.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. When he files a certificate?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Whereas the amendment of the Senator from Georgia absolutely requires two judges in every case.

Mr. ALLISON. Under this bill it is made the duty of the Attorney-General to make that certificate on every occasion.

Mr. STONE. Where is that provision?

Mr. FULTON. On the same page—page 318.

Mr. ALDRICH. In lines 15, 16, and 17.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to interrupt him? I want to call his attention to these words in the bill——

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will excuse me, I understood the Senator from Georgia to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BACON. No; I did not.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa, if he will allow me, to the language of the bill which makes it mandatory.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I think I have the floor; and I rise to address myself to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia which is pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Idaho to yield the floor to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DUBOIS. To the Senator from Iowa, not to other Senators.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa has yielded to other Senators.

Mr. DUBOIS. I do not want to be discourteous, but as I understand it the discussion is drifting away from the proposition to which I desire to address myself. The Senator from Minnesota is now calling attention——

Mr. NELSON. I was not taking the floor in my own right. I simply rose to make a suggestion to the Senator from Iowa, if he will allow me.

Mr. ALLISON. I will with great pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. I call his attention to this mandatory language in line 15, on page 318 of the pamphlet amendments. I read it in response to the question of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]:

> It shall be the duty of the Attorney-General in every such case to file the certificate provided for in said expediting act of February 11, 1903.

It is made the duty of the Attorney-General positively by the bill as it came from the House to file that expediting request. So it covers exactly what the Senator from Georgia aims at.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I shall vote for any proposition to make it difficult for the courts to overturn the orders of the Commission. I think the orders of the Commission should stand until there is a final decree. I voted with pleasure for the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] which restrained the courts from enjoining rates fixed by the Commission. I voted for the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] as a second choice. I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], although we may find ourselves in great difficulty when we multiply the number of judges who shall hear the preliminary order or injunction.

There is one case that seems to have escaped the attention of the lawyers of this Chamber. If we find such conditions now as existed when this cause was heard, you will find it difficult to get a decision from the court. The Joint Traffic Association, having its offices chiefly in the southern district of New York, was violating the interstate-commerce law in that by an arrangement a majority of those railroads (32 in number) who belonged to the association could fix a rate. The association was to announce a rate on the 1st day of January, 1906. They were enjoined, or attempted to be, by the United States attorney for the southern district of New York from putting the rate into effect because they were violating the United States law against "pooling." There are eight judges in that circuit, and it was found when they went before Judge Lacombe for the injunction that he could not hear the case because he owned stocks or bonds in one of the railroads; and it was also ascertained that every one of those judges in the southern district of New York was in the same predicament, save and except the district judge in Vermont—Judge Wheeler. You could not have gotten three judges in that situation to try the case. They finally had it heard in the district court of Vermont before Judge Wheeler, and he would not listen to the appeal and dismissed the suit of the Interstate Commerce Commission after four days' oral argument and filed his decision dismissing the bill on May 28, 1896. From that decision an appeal was taken by the United States to the circuit court of appeals for the second circuit—i. e., New York City.

In the meantime Judge Lacombe had become qualified, because he had sold his stocks and bonds. That made him eligible to sit. I presume that the other judge had become eligible on the same account, because William J. Wallace and Henry E. Lacombe, the judges, both sat, although both were disqualified when the suit was brought, and they affirmed the decision of the district judge in Vermont on March 19, 1897, but rendered no opinion. (See 89 Fed. Rep., 1020.)

The United States, through United States District Attorney Wallace McFarlane, then took the appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. In one year and nine months afterwards the Supreme Court of the United States overturned both of the inferior courts. (See 171 U. S., 505.)

I am afraid that we may get into difficulty if we increase the number of judges, although I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia. My opinion is that a commission selected as I think this Commission will be, is more apt to do justice to the shipper and the carrier than the courts, and my opinion is that very little should be left to the courts except as to the constitutionality of the law and as to whether the Commission has exceeded its power in interpreting the law.

I do not know whether it is the general rule that judges all over the United States are in the condition in which they were in the southern district of New York, where they could not sit on these cases, but I do know that we are the men who really select the United States judges. There is scarcely one of us who has not been instrumental in appointing a United States judge. I have very great respect for them, but they are men we select from among our political associates, and they do not become greatly superior the moment that we have selected them.

If the Interstate Commerce Commission to be appointed should be composed of shippers who have been injured by the railroad companies in the past, it would not be a fair commission, nor would it be a fair commission if it should be composed only of lawyers who have been in the employ of corporations; nor would it be a fair commission if it should be composed entirely of railroad men. I imagine it will be selected from all of these classes.

But I believe, on the other hand, that in the great majority of cases the judges of the inferior courts are selected from amongst lawyers who have been in the employ of corporations. I do not say they are dishonest. I do not mean to imply that they are, for I do not believe they are dishonest or intend to be partial; but their minds have run in those channels always, which render them friendly to the interests of the railroads, and they believe sincerely along certain lines which make them, in my opinion, less fit to judge fairly and honestly between the shipper and the carrier than would be this Commission.
